

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

PREFATORY NOTE

My thanks are due to many whose kindness has contributed to the making of this book. In the first place, I have to thank Mrs. Cheatle, who, by allowing me access to the portion of the Burford Records in her possession, gave the first impulse towards what has become a considerable undertaking. Secondly, I express my thanks to the Burford Charity Trustees for the long study I was permitted to make of the Records in their keeping. In this connexion I gladly acknowledge my indebtedness to Mr. E. J. Horniman, who not only provided the monetary guarantee required by the Trustees for the safety of their documents, but has, throughout my work, given me that peculiarly valuable kind of encouragement—an ever-ready interest in the details of my investigations. To the President and Fellows of Brasenose College, Oxford, my thanks are due for permission to print extracts from the series of leases of property in Burford formerly held by the College, which the kindness of the Bursar of the College enabled me to consult, and from which I have gathered some of the earliest facts, hitherto unknown, in the history of the Corporation of Burford.

The Rev. W. C. Emeris, M.A., Vicar of Burford and Rural Dean, has added to many incidental kindnesses the writing of much of the chapter on the parish church of Burford, thus giving to my book in that respect an authority which no one else could have given it. I am sincerely grateful to him for the generosity with which he has allowed me to make use of his knowledge in this and other points of Burford history.

To the skill of my brother-in-law, Mr. David Crichton, M.A., and of Mr. Frederick Hall, Controller of the Oxford University Press, I owe the admirable series of photographs of Burford buildings; and to Mr. H. E. Conway the view of Burford, from a painting by him, which appears as the frontispiece.

I am under a great obligation to the Rev. A. J. Carlyle, Litt.D., Fellow of University College, who devoted much of his valuable time to reading the book in manuscript, made fruitful suggestions as to the arrangement of the matter, and was kind enough to stand sponsor for it to the authorities of the University Press.

Finally, though it would be impossible here to express an adequate gratitude for the generous help my wife has afforded at every stage of the book's progress, it would be equally impossible to make no mention of it. Without her constant aid, her wise and patient criticism, and her love and knowledge of Burford and the Cotswolds, the work would never have been done.

R. H. GRETTON.

NOTE ON THE FRONTISPIECE TO PART III

THE following description of the Maces and Seals of the ancient Corporation of Burford is extracted from Corporation Plate and Insignia of Office, by L. Jewitt, F.S.A., and E. H. St. John Hope, F.S.A. (ii. 258).

The earlier of the maces is of silver, and measures thirteen and three-sixteenths inches in length. It has a plain slender shaft (with an iron core) to which are affixed, just below the centre, five wavy flanges with moulded edges and enclosing strap-work scrolls. Just below the head is a moulded ring, and at the bottom is a flat button engraved, seal fashion, with a lion rampant. The head, which is supported by a calix of sixteen petals, is globular in form and surmounted by a coronet of ten crosses and as many fleur-de-lis, resting on a bold cable moulding. On the flat top, within a quatrefoil, are the royal arms, France and England quarterly; originally enamelled. This interesting mace is probably of sixteenth-century date, but the lion on the button looks later.

The other mace is two feet nine inches and five-eighths long, and also of silver. It is of the usual late type with crowned head surmounted by the orb and cross, but the design of the shaft is somewhat unusual. The head, which is supported by four slender brackets, is handsomely wrought with four frosted oval panels, with ornate leafwork between, containing the usual royal badges, viz. the rose, thistle, fleur-de-lis, and harp, severally crowned. The crown surmounting the head has a delicately worked coronet, and jewelled arches depressed in the centre so as to touch the cap beneath, which bears in relief the royal arms and supporters in use from 1714 to 1801, with the arms of Burford, a lion rampant below. The shaft consists of (i) a short plain section with the brackets below the mace-head; (ii) a long section, with slight medial band and two panelled terminal bosses, ornamented throughout with a bold leaf pattern arranged as a spiral band; below this again is (iii) the handle or grip, at first plain, then wrought with leaves, and gradually swelling out towards the foot-knop, which is also chased with leafwork. The mace bears the leopard's head and lion passant gardant of the London hall-marks, but no date letter, and for the maker, I W, with a rose above, for John Wisdome (entered 1720). The maker's mark is twice struck, and similarly repeated under the head. The mace not improbably dates from George the Second's charter of 1742.

The common seal, of silver, is of the unusual form of a pointed oval, two and one-eighth inches long. The device is a boldly engraved lion rampant, facing to the sinister (probably by inadvertence on the part of the engraver), with the marginal legend ✠ SIGILL' COMMUNE . BURGENSEIUM . DE . BUREFORD. On either side of the lion are the two centres from which the curved sides and lines of the seal were struck. On the back is a loop for suspension, from which three long leaf-like branches diverge and extend over the seal. Date circa 1250.

The other seal, which is attached to the silver one by a plaited leather thong, has probably been used as a counter-seal. It is a pointed oval, one and three-eighths of an inch long, and of latten, with a small loop at the top. The device represents a clerk in amice and girded alb kneeling under a trefoiled arch surmounted by a half-length figure of Our Lady and Child. Legend ✠ AVE MARIA GRĀ PLENA DNS TECUM.

It should be remarked that in the reference to 'George the Second's charter' the authors of the above description had been misled by a faulty list of the town charters. No charter was ever obtained at such a date; the document mistaken for a charter of 1742 is really a writ under the Great Seal.

It may also be remarked that the smaller seal has sometimes been described as the 'Priory seal'. In view of the device it bears it is much more probable, to say the least, that it was the seal of the Gild, which was dedicated to the Blessed Virgin. This also would account for its having been kept attached by a thong to the Town seal, since the Gild and the Corporation are indistinguishable. The Priory seal would, on the contrary, have been very unlikely to be preserved in that particular way. Moreover, the dedication of the Priory was to St. John the Evangelist; and the legend on its seal would almost certainly have been in the common form—Sigillum Hospitalis Sti. Iohannis de Burford—or something of that kind.

PART I

HISTORY OF THE CORPORATION OF BURFORD

INTRODUCTION

THE study of the development of town government and municipal structure in England is of necessity founded chiefly on the history of the large and important towns, partly because the processes of their growth are comparatively coherent and easy to follow, partly for the reason that their records are more ample and more readily available. But the history of a small town may, nevertheless, have its contribution to make; its very failures may help towards a truer understanding of both the potentialities and the limitations of borough charters.

The history of the ancient Corporation of Burford certainly has light to throw upon the relation between a manorial borough and its lord. It shows at once how far such a borough could proceed, in favourable circumstances, towards an apparent independence, and how precarious was its liberty. Owing to the fact that for some centuries after its first enfranchisement Burford was an outlying and insignificant member of the Honour of Gloucester, and that even tenants for life were men of great possessions and resided elsewhere, the original Gild Merchant attained by degrees a position which during the sixteenth century was in practice indistinguishable from that of a completely chartered town. Yet as soon as a lord of the manor put that position to the test of the law it collapsed. The reason for the collapse provides the first sidelight upon the study of municipal institutions which Burford has to offer. It is the truth that the keystone of town charters is to be found in the fee-farm. For a hundred years certainly, and probably for longer than that, the burgesses of Burford administered the Borough Court, the markets, and the fairs, maintained a gallows and pillory, made by-laws and punished by fines and imprisonment any breaches of the by-laws. Nor were the burgesses passing beyond the bounds of what the charters had allowed to be done in Burford. But when the exercise of these franchises was questioned by a lord of the manor it was clear that they belonged not to the men of Burford as such, but to them as the men of a manorial lord. Unless, therefore, they were in recognizable allegiance to a lord they had no claim to the privileges; and that recognizable allegiance had to be expressed by payment of a rent. In other words, the clauses of charters may contain everything necessary for the passing of town affairs into the hands of people of the town; but if they do not contain a definite farm of the town they are an extension of the privileges of the lord of the manor and not really an enfranchisement of the town.

Another conclusion to be drawn from the history of Burford is that the use of the words 'enfranchisement' and 'liberties' should be carefully restricted, as we have already learned to restrict the use of the words 'corporation' and 'corporate body'. To the modern mind, accustomed to the idea of self-government in our great towns, it is almost impossible to use the words 'franchises' or 'liberties' without an accompanying conception of a policy of local independence and local responsibility. No such conception is ever to be traced in the proceedings of the burgesses of Burford. Their emergence as a corporate body is purely accidental, the result of a series of administrative needs that had to be met, and opportunities that offered themselves to be taken. At the period of their highest development they show no concern for the internal well-being of the town; the bailiffs, the wardsmen, and the constables are answerable to the lord of the manor at the Court Leet, not to the burgesses in the Borough Court. There is no association of the general body of inhabitants in the government of the town; the Corporation remained a self-electing Gild, devoid of public responsibility. Their own interpretation of their charters, and the functions they exercised in that interpretation, will be much better understood by keeping always to the front the idea of 'privileges', and avoiding altogether the idea of 'liberty'.

This is not to say, of course, that in the more highly developed towns there was the same total lack of a deliberate policy of independence. But it serves as a useful warning that even in the case of those towns the word 'enfranchisement' should be used with caution, and must be justified by proof. Charters, Professor Maitland remarked, do not create communities. It might be added that they do not necessarily enfranchise communities. They often merely confer privileges for the enrichment of the lord, which might in certain circumstances be perverted to the enrichment of some of the members of the community.

Another theory of Maitland's will be found to be well illustrated in the following pages. He was fond of maintaining that the growth and survival of a 'personality' in a town depended largely upon the existence of 'a revenue which is not going to be divided amongst the townsfolk'. This in Burford was provided by the Charity Lands. From an early date the burgesses found themselves in control of property held for public purposes; and on at least two occasions when the Corporation appeared to be in danger of extinction, it was this control which secured its continuance.

CHAPTER I

THE ORIGINS OF THE TOWN

§ I

THE original grant of liberties to Burford is of remarkably early date. It provides, indeed, the earliest dated instance of the establishment of a Gild Merchant. For the first charter is in the name of Robert FitzHamon,¹ and must therefore have been granted between 1088, the year in which Burford, with other possessions in Oxfordshire and Gloucestershire, came into his hands, and 1107, the year in which he died.

The grant was not of a Gild Merchant alone. It included also the liberties customary in the setting up of a borough, namely, the right to hold houses and lands at a money rent instead of by service, the right to sell or otherwise dispose of property and to devise property by will without obligation to the lord of the manor, the right to hold à market, and other 'free customs'—in this case the free customs of the men of Oxford.

The community to which this grant was made was small and purely agricultural. In the Domesday Survey, which is so near in date to FitzHamon's charter that its evidence on this point may be taken without modification, the entry relating to Burford is as follows :

Albericus Comes tenuit de terra episcopi Bureford Ibi sunt viii hide Terra xx carucarum Nunc in dominico iiii carucae et iiii servi et xxii villani et xviii bordarii habent xii carucas Ibi ii molini de xxv solidis et xxv acrae prati Pastura i leu in longitudine et in latitudine Valuit xvi libras modo xiii libras.

Nothing is indicated here beyond a village community of a usual Domesday type, and of a size that could give it no special place among the villages of the hundred or the shire. Of other villages in the same hundred, Stanton Harcourt, for instance, was larger, and Bampton, with its four mills, fisheries, salt-ings, and market, was more than six times as valuable.

The bestowal of liberties upon a community so small and devoid of any special resources demands some explanation. What motive and what intention directed the alteration of its status? An answer to this question is perhaps to be found in the history of the lordship of the manor at this period.

In 1088 Robert FitzHamon,¹ in reward for his support of William Rufus against the rebellion of Bishop Odo, received a large gift of lands formerly held by the Bishop, and among them the manor of Burford. He incorporated it into the Honour of Gloucester—the most valuable part of his new possessions—and it remained for some centuries a manor of that Honour.

In this way Burford, from having been in all probability the principal seat of a manorial lord,² became an outlying dependency of a lord with far more important places in which to reside.³ As a source of supplies in kind it was insignificant.⁴ There might easily therefore be every inclination on the part of a lord reviewing his new territories to make the place a source of monetary revenue by erecting in it a market which would pay him tolls and a court which would collect fees. He would be the more likely to do this, since otherwise the inhabitants of this portion of his territories, remote from markets subject to him, would frequent the markets of other manors and be adding to the revenue of other lords.

² The mansion here was, at any rate, more than twice as large as Earl Aubrey's two other mansions. See Part II, p. 158.

It is difficult to find any other explanation than this of the grant of the first charter. The motive cannot have been given by the inhabitants of the place. It is, no doubt, possible that in the years following the Norman settlement the situation of Burford upon what was to be for centuries the main route from South Wales and Gloucester to Oxford, and by Oxford to London, had brought into the place new inhabitants. The number of Welsh names found among the population at a later date is evidence of the passage of merchants and tradesmen along this route from the west, and traffic of that kind may have begun to affect Burford before the end of the eleventh century. It is also possible that these travellers, coming from places already large and flourishing, such as Gloucester and Tewkesbury, may have discerned in this situation an opportunity for trading-profits. But it is not possible to suppose that in the twenty years between the date of Domesday and the year 1107, during which the first charter must have been granted, the village had become so profoundly modified in character as to make a movement towards market privileges and liberties. It is more reasonable to regard the grant of liberties as an act by the lord of the manor in development of his estate; and that explanation will be found to accord with such knowledge as we have of the effects of the charters upon the life of the place during the earliest period of their operation.

This period is conveniently set for us by the fact that in the middle of the fourteenth century we come to the beginning of the records preserved in the town, so that it is natural to make the first stage in the town's history run from its enfranchisement to that date. Moreover, this division coincides so clearly with a distinct grouping into which the town charters fall that it becomes a real, and not merely a convenient division.

The first six of the documents coming under this head may properly be called charters, four of them emanating from lords of the manor and two from the Crown.¹ The remainder are Letters Patent of Confirmation, obtained by the town from the Chancery at the beginning of every new reign, with the exception of two, from the accession of Edward III to that of James I.¹

8 HISTORY OF THE CORPORATION OF BURFORD

One effect of this grouping of the charters is to show markedly that the town had in its earliest period no conception of burghal liberties or of the tenure of a borough in independence of a manorial lord. The two royal charters do not tell against this view. For it is clear from their phrasing that neither was really granted to the town. They were obtained from Henry II by William, Earl of Gloucester, and are confirmations of his rights and privileges with special clauses relating to Burford. They are not, therefore, royal charters to Burford in the strict sense of the term, but are royal confirmations of manorial grants, belonging to a period before the Chancery had developed the system of Letters Patent of Insuperimus.

The significance of this fact becomes more striking when we observe that these are the only royal documents of our first period. In other words, the reigns of Richard I and John—a singularly active time in the securing of privileges and liberties by English towns—are wholly unrepresented in our series. The manorial history of Burford makes this blank particularly noticeable. For John's marriage with Isabella, daughter of Earl William of Gloucester, brought him, among the territories assigned to him by Richard in 1189, the Honour of Gloucester. He was thus lord of the manor of Burford, and he retained the manor for seven years after his accession. It might have been expected that this special association with the Crown, at the very time when the granting of borough charters had been discovered to be a source of revenue, and was therefore being expanded and elaborated beyond any point hitherto reached, would have offered an opportunity which the men of Burford could hardly miss. Yet they made no attempt to take advantage of it, either for clearer definition of their liberties, or for effecting the passage—easy to them when their manorial lord was also the king—from subjection to a mesne lord to direct responsibility under the Crown.

It is, no doubt, necessary to remember that, as the Chancery developed the contents and phraseology of borough charters, the fees due to the Exchequer would also be developed, and Burford must have been far from wealthy. Yet a place like Godmanchester, no less immature than Burford as a commercial centre, rose to the obtaining of quite an important charter from King John.¹ The idea of such a degree of independence, rather than the means of obtaining it, must have been lacking.

This conclusion is emphasized by the character of the last charter of our first group. It is in the name of Richard de Clare, and is therefore to be dated between 1230 and 1262.² He grants to the burgesses of Burford 'eas libertates et liberas consuetudines quas habent a predecessore nostris comitibus Gloucestriae'. There is no suggestion here of the town's privileges having passed in any sense beyond what previous Earls of Gloucester had granted, or beyond what Richard de Clare could grant in the exercise of a mesne lord's powers. It is clear that the charters of Henry II had not been intended as an enhancement of the previous charters by privileges which the Crown alone could bestow upon a town, and equally clear that they had not been interpreted by the burgesses in any such way.

This persistence in their original status may be held to support strongly the view that the motive for the town's enfranchisement resided wholly on the side of the lord, and not at all on that of the inhabitants. So complete a detachment from the general movement of English boroughs during the late twelfth and early thirteenth centuries towards more precise definition of liberties and more detailed and authoritative charters could hardly have been shown by a community with any conception of burghal independence. It is, however, quite comprehensible on the theory that the grants of privileges were, so to speak, imposed on the town from without, by the lord of the manor for his own purposes, and were in origin unrelated to aspirations of the inhabitants.

An examination of the terms of the charters will be found to lead to the same conclusion. They are throughout vague and rudimentary ; and they contain, with the single exception of the establishment of a Gild Merchant, no organizing or structural clauses at all.

Three of the six are but confirmations in general terms of existing liberties, and refer to 'liberties and free customs' without specifying them. Another, the charter of Earl William of Gloucester, is an express repetition of the original charter of Robert FitzHamon. Thus, of effective charters, there only remain two—that of FitzHamon and one of the charters of Henry II.

The franchises conveyed in the former are as follows :

Ut unusquisque domum et terram et omnem pecuniam suam possit vendere et in vadimonio ponere et de filio et filia vel uxore et de quolibet alio absque ipsius domini requisicione heredem faciat et gildam et consuetudines quas habent Burgenses de Oxenford in Gildam mercatorum et quicumque ad mercatum venire volunt veniant et in ipso mercato habeant licenciam emendi quecumque volunt preter lanam et corea nisi homines ipsius ville.¹

The charter of Henry II is as follows :

H Rex Angliae et Dux Normanniae et Aquitaniae et Comes Andegaviae Episcopo Lincolnensi et Iusticiariis et vicecomitibus et omnibus ballivis suis de Oxenfordscira salutem Mando vobis et firmiter precipio quod homines Willelmi comitis Glocestriae de Boreford et de Mora sint ita bene et in pace et quieti de omnibus querelis et ita teneant omnes terras suas et omnia tenementa sua cum sak et soc et tol et theam et infanghenethes et cum omnibus aliis libertatibus et liberis consuetudinibus suis sicut melius et liberius tenuerunt tempore Regis H avi mei Testibus Reginaldo comite Cornubiae et Umfredo de Bohun dapifero et Warenno filio Geroldi comite apud Norhampton.

These documents give us the setting up first of burgage tenure with the right of testamentary disposition, a Gild

Merchant, and a market with a ban of wool and hides to the inhabitants; to which were added by the later document two jurisdictional privileges—freedom from external pleas,¹ and cognizance of minor offences under the phrase 'sak et soc et tol et theam et infanghenethef'.²

Now these franchises would not strike us, in relation to any period up to the end of the reign of Henry II, as inadequate for an enfranchised community, nor the phrases conveying them as unusually vague. When, however, we find them existing unmodified in the fourteenth century, at which time they have to stand, as vehicles of burghal liberties, beside the charters wherein other boroughs had laid their foundations firmly during the reigns of Richard and John and then built up systematic constitutions under succeeding sovereigns, their limited nature becomes very apparent. The privileges obtained are seen to be insignificant beside those that might have been obtained. The holding of the borough at farm, the return of writs, the right to appoint a reeve or other chief officer, the right to appoint coroners, freedom from the Hundred and Shire Courts with the right to appear before the Justices in Eyre by twelve representatives of the town—none of these privileges, so generally sought by the boroughs of the time, find place in the Burford charters.

Thus from another direction we come to the same view of the motive for the charters. If it had resided in the inhabitants there must have been some modification of the contents and phraseology of the grants, since that motive, during a period of active burghal development, could hardly have remained stationary. If, on the other hand, the motive resided in the lord of the manor, there would be less need for modification. His object being to convert a place comparatively useless to him in its agricultural activities into a source of monetary revenue, he would be under no necessity to provide more than the minimum of executive machinery for that purpose. The singular absence of detail in the charter of Richard de Clare, and the apparent sufficiency of its general reference to the grants of previous Earls, may be taken as the final proof that this is the true interpretation of the whole group of charters.

Of the nature of the executive which in fact came into being under the charters we are but scantily informed during this first period. I have been able to find only five references which distinctly indicate the beginnings of incorporation. Two are in a grant and quit-claim of circa 1250; the execution of the deed is ratified by the use of 'commune sigillum de Bureford'; and the list of witnesses closes with the words 'et curia burgen-cium de bureford'.¹ The third is in an indenture of lease dated 1264 between the Abbey of Cold Norton and Walter Adgar of Burford, in which the tenant binds himself to certain cove-nants concerning repairs, &c., et ad ista predicta fideliter observanda supponit se et omnia catalla sua mobilia et immobilia sub pena dimidie marce solvende dictis priori et canonicis et ballivis de bureford.²

The fourth occurs in the Hundred Rolls in an entry concerning lands at Nether Worton held by John Giffard of Brimpsfield: Idem Iohannes tenet de Comite Glov'nie de feodo de Bureford redditu xs. et secta curiae de iii septimanis in iii septimanas de Bereford pro omni servicio.³

³ Hundred Rolls (ed. 1818), ii. 842.

The fifth is in an Inquisition Post Mortem concerning the lands of Gilbert de Clare in 1314, in which the following entry occurs among his possessions at Burford :

Et sunt ibi xiii burgenses qui reddunt per annum xiiis. vid. ad iiii terminos videlicet ad festum nativitatis beati Iohannis Baptiste Beati Michaelis Beati Thome Apostoli et festum palmarum equis porcionibus.¹

This evidence, though not great in quantity, is at any rate fairly precise. It establishes the existence, first, of a Common Seal at an early date ; secondly, of a Borough Court of the regular three-weekly type ; thirdly, of Bailiffs of the town ; and fourthly, of a limited body of inhabitants discharging some kind of fixed rental.

The reference to the common seal is especially interesting.² For it speaks, not of the common seal of the Burgesses, but of the common seal of Burford. We can already discern the presence of that idea of the town's personality,—of the town as something other than the mere sum of its inhabitants—which Maitland finds so elusive in the early history of boroughs.

In the Court of the Burgesses and the thirteen Burgesses mentioned as a body, we can equally discern a repository for this idea—a group of men in which the town's personality was beginning to be seen as residing. In other words, there was already a kind of Corporation formed inside the general body of enfranchised inhabitants. This is not a direct corollary of the charters. So far as they go, they only incorporate the town in the very rudimentary sense of combining into a privileged community the whole of the inhabitants without exception. The charter of FitzHamon conveys 'omnibus meis hominibus de Burford' the right to have a Gild Merchant. Even in the middle of the thirteenth century a literal application of the words would not have been impossible. There were hardly more than a hundred free inhabitants to share in the privileges of the Gild.¹ But as those privileges—the right to pre-emption in the market, the exclusive right to sell by retail in the town, and so on—were very real advantages, there would be a tendency quite early to limit the membership, whether by imposing an entrance fee or by demanding some qualification for entrance.

Whether the Curia Burgensium was at this date (as we know it was later) co-extensive with the limited Gild we have no evidence to show. But since this was a body acting officially and using a common seal, and since the only body that had been called into existence by the charters was the Gild, the two may be, provisionally at least, identified.² It is at any rate clear that a concentration of the town's personality, capable of becoming later an incorporation of that personality, had taken place. For the description 'burgensis' is beginning to have a limited application. It was ultimately to be the official title of a member of the Corporation; and even in the thirteenth century it was ceasing to be used at Burford in the general sense for any holder of a burgage tenement. The description for these tenants in documents of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries is 'liberi tenentes'; they appear so in all the Inquisitions Post Mortem of that period. Hence a reference to thirteen people as 'burgenses', occurring as it does in a document of that very class, must be a deliberate designation by a formal title. The particular number of men thus designated is not without significance. The Burford Corporation, when it emerges fully constituted, was composed with more or less regularity of two Bailiffs, an Alderman, and ten Burgesses. The number was not very strictly held, and in the sixteenth century was slightly exceeded. But the variation was never very great. It can hardly be a mere coincidence that the mention of certain men in 1314 under a description not applied generally to the townsmen should give us a number closely corresponding with the number of the Corporation at later periods.

There is thus enough evidence to establish the important fact that the Curia Burgensium, whether co-extensive with the Gild or not, was certainly not co-extensive with the population of the enfranchised area. This constitutes the vital step in the history of a borough at which a limited number of the inhabitants begin, by the use of a common seal which can be described as the seal of the town, to act as the town.

We may have a glimpse of a chief officer of this body in an Inquisition of 1294, when one of the jurors was Robertus le Maior.¹ The head of the established Corporation of a later date was always called the Alderman. But titles of borough officials during the thirteenth century were not very rigidly employed; and the chief officer of Burford may occasionally have been called the Mayor.

We may have also a glimpse of a minor official called the Marshal. One William le Maryschal or le Mareschal de Bureford appears in various documents.² He was constantly present on the juries of Inquisitions; yet his assessment in the Lay Subsidies is a small one. He may, therefore, have served on the juries by reason of an official position; and he may have been the officer whose title later on was that of Seneschal or Steward.

The reference to the Bailiffs shows that they were commonly regarded as officers of the town. But there is another reference to them within the first period which provides a warning of the limits within which even so distinctly formed a Corporation has to be considered. In the Close Roll for 1301 there is a case of replevin of land forfeited by default 'before the bailiffs of Ralph de Monte Hermeri and Joan his wife, in their Court of Burford'.³ The position of the Bailiffs was equivocal throughout the history of the town, owing to the manner of their appointment. The custom was for the Burgesses to nominate four men annually to the steward of the lord of the manor, who thereupon selected two of them to be Bailiffs.¹ Naturally, as the corporate life of the town strengthened, the Bailiffs became more and more identified with the Corporation. But at this early date it is clear that they could still be regarded as manorial officers.

The same warning applies also to our estimate of the Borough Court. Not only does the reference just quoted speak of it as the Court of the lord of the manor, but the reference from the Hundred Rolls quoted earlier shows that in practice it was used for manorial purposes, since it was in this Court that John Giffard owed suit for his holding. Quite evidently the charters, in the view of the lord of the manor, had been designed to alter merely the function, and not the status of Burford. Just as the Court Leet and the Homage of a village were his, and yet acted as a kind of self-government for the village, so the Borough Court and the Burgesses, however much they were beginning to incorporate the town, were his. They were different in kind, because the function of a town in producing a monetary revenue required different machinery—a more frequently sitting and more authoritative Court and a more concentrated executive—from that of a place producing only agricultural supplies. But in theory (if one may for the moment speak as if theory on such a point could have existed) they were the same.

This accounts for the state of things we find when we turn from the embryo Corporation itself to the question of what it administered—the scope and nature of its functions. For of town affairs, as such, there is no trace at all; everything seems to be the affair of the lord of the manor.

There were three heads under which the place would produce revenue: (i) The burgate rents; (ii) The market, mills, &c.; (iii) The Court. Of course, in every borough these sources of revenue were in some sense the affair of the overlord, whether the charter proceeded from a private individual or from the Crown. For the fee-farm was a payment in consideration of the loss of these profits by the lord as a result of handing over to the borough the whole of its internal affairs. But in Burford they were directly, and not indirectly, the affair of the lord; the evidence of Inquisitions during this first period goes to show that under all three heads the revenue was paid in detail to the lord of the manor. The town was never held at farm.

There is, indeed, one instance of the use of the phrase 'firma burgi'. An Account of Escheats of 1231 includes the following :

Oxonia. Et de viili. viis. xd. et obolo de firma forinseca de Bureford de hoc anno et termino S Michaelis anni precedentis Et de liiis. iiid. de firma burgi molendini et fori Et de c & vs. de operationibus parvis ad firmam.¹

The 'firma burgi' here may possibly be the same item as the 13s. 6d. paid by the thirteen Burgesses in 1314; it must at any rate have been a small sum, since the total of this rent and the rents of the mill and market only amounted to 54s. 4d. Possibly also the same item may be traced in an Inquisition of 1337, in which Eleanor, wife of Hugh le Despenser, who was then in possession of the manor, appears seised de octodecim solidis uno denario uno obolo et uno quadrante Redditus assisi per annum de quibusdam liberis tenentibus in Bureford.²

This small sum can hardly be a true 'firma burgi'. Moreover, the details given in other Inquisitions make it perfectly clear that the town was not held at farm. In 1297 there is an entry of cv liberi tenentes qui reddunt per annum xxli. xiiis. vd. ad quatuor anni terminos . . . est ibi quoddam mercatum quod valet per annum simul cum feria stallagio et tolneto cervisie ibidem xlii. . . . est apud Upton quoddam molendinum aquaticum quod valet per annum lxs. . . . placita et perquisita curiae et visus ibidem valent per annum xxs.³

In 1304 the entries are as follows :

Sunt in eadem villa cum hameletto predicto xxx*libr.* vid. de quodam redditu per annum, . . . tolloneum dicte ville valet per annum x*libr.* xviii*s.* Et est ibi unum molendinum ad predictam villam pertinens quod valet per annum l*xs.* . . . placita et perquisita curie valent per annum xx*vs.* vid.¹

In 1314 the entry relating to the thirteen Burgesses is the only mention of town rents ; other profits appear thus :

Et quoddam mercatum per annum per diem Sabbatis cuius proficuum valet una cum Nundinis ibidem die Nativitatis beati Iohannis Baptiste existentibus valent (sic) per annum x*li.* Et placita et perquisita curie eiusdem ville valent per annum l*xs.*

In the Inquisition of 1337 which gives the rental already mentioned to Eleanor le Despenser, the market toll is put at 5*s.*, the fair on St. John's Day at 26*s.* 8*d.*, the view of frank-pledge at 3*s.* 4*d.*, and the Court pleas at 13*s.* 4*d.*

From these documents it is evident that no branch of the town's activities was in the hands of the Corporation except as agent for the lord of the manor. There is, however, one document coming within this period which did raise for a short time a revenue to be paid to, and administered by, men of the town without responsibility to the lord of the manor. In 1322, the bridge over the river having fallen into disrepair, Edward II issued at the instance of Hugh le Despenser Letters Patent addressed 'probis hominibus de Bureford', granting them the right to levy tolls for a period of three years upon all merchandise passing over the bridge for sale.²

After the warnings which other references have given against assuming at this stage too much 'personality' or corporate entity in the character of the town, this grant may be used as a corrective on the other side. The Letters Patent are addressed to 'the men of Burford', in the general formula employed in the charters. But it is obvious that the business arising under the grant must have been transacted by some smaller body than the inhabitants at large. It must have devolved upon the limited group of Burgesses. Moreover, the grant may, without undue conjecture, be regarded as rendered possible only by a generally accepted recognition of this group as embodying, in however rudimentary a degree, the town. Otherwise it would almost certainly have been made to the lord of the manor. It is important to note, too, that the grant must have accelerated the tendencies towards incorporation of the town in this body. The collection and expenditure of a revenue not derived from the townsfolk, and not payable to the lord, would make the position of the group of Burgesses less purely domestic, so to speak, than it had hitherto been; and, since their responsibility under the Letters Patent, for the proper disposal of the money accruing and for the observance of the time limit of the grant, was to the Crown direct, they would be by so much removed from the manorial supremacy.

Another corrective of our estimate of the Burgesses' position is to be found in the Hundred Rolls. The town there appears as claiming the important liberty of the return of writs: 'Qui eciam alii a Rege clamant habere returnum brevium et alias libertates, etc.'¹ In one way the claim need not be taken very seriously. It was put forward after the close of the long reign of Henry III, when the country was full of encroachments upon the rights of the Crown; it appears in the Rolls only in the course of the Extractum Inquisitionum specially made for the use of the Justices, concerning liberties unwarrantably assumed;² there is no record of any attempt to uphold it in the Quo Warranto proceedings which followed the Inquisitions, and no trace at any time of the appointment of coroners in Burford.

The validity of the claim, therefore, need not concern us. The fact of its having been made is the point of interest. No clause in the charters would justify it for a moment. Therefore the fact of its having been made means that the burghal consciousness was strong enough to conceive of rights as belonging automatically to the place as a borough. The corporate entity of the Burgesses was sufficiently marked to cause them to act, upon occasion, in the same way as bodies which were by charter incorporations of towns.

² Curiously enough, Burford appears in the Rolls only in this Extractum; it is absent from the fuller Inquisitions of 7 Edw. I. This is unfortunate, since it deprives us of the detailed information about the status of the inhabitants which is available for other Oxfordshire towns.

That is, in reality, the formula upon which the whole evolution of the Burford Corporation proceeded.

CHAPTER II

THE GROWTH OF CORPORATE RESPONSIBILITY :

1350-1500

§ I

THE opening of the series of Burford Records preserved in the town itself, which has already been noted as marking the second period of its history, is of importance from more than one aspect. Obviously it may be expected to provide more ample information about the character of the burgensic body. But it may also be regarded as an indication of a new spirit at work in the life and affairs of the town.

That new spirit must, it is true, be but cautiously interpreted. It is not to be seen wholly as marking the advance in a conception of town government and the purport of incorporation. For only a very small portion of the existing Records can be called strictly municipal records, and of that portion not one item belongs to the period now under consideration. Two fragments of a book covering parts of the years 1596, 1597, and 1598 are all that survive to represent the work of the Borough Court. The only volume that could be classed as a Minute Book or Memorandum Book of the Corporation is a thin volume of the sixteenth century, which contains a number of entries of meetings and resolutions of the Corporation, records the names of Bailiffs during the greater part of the century, and preserves some notes on the mode of election and the duties of certain officials. But it is, throughout, a note book rather than a systematic Minute Book. A roll of 1605 records the Rules of the Fellowship of Burgesses, with the signatures of all the Burgesses from that date down to the extinction of the Corporation in 1861. A copy of a judgement of the Court of Exchequer in 1620 concerning the town's liberties, and a mass of papers relating to a Royal Commission in 1738 and a subsequent Chancery suit, may be added to the list.

With these exceptions, practically all the Records, amounting to over four hundred documents and some thirty volumes of accounts and memoranda kept during the seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries, are concerned with the administration of certain public properties, chiefly for charitable purposes. Indirectly a good deal of knowledge of the constitution and methods of the Corporation is to be derived from these sources; but in character they are nearer to the churchwardens' accounts of a village than to the muniments of a town.

This fact gives us the principal reason for the beginning of a systematic preservation of records in the town. We have to find this, not in a new sense of corporate unity and continuity, but simply in the responsibilities arising from the foundation of a number of charities. We are now in the most prosperous period of the Cotswold country—the great period of the English wool trade. At Burford, as elsewhere, much of this wealth was given to the service of religion—the building and adornment of the church, the foundation and endowment of chantry chapels, and the relief of the poor. Some of these funds came directly to the Gild as such, for the maintenance of its chapel and priest and the welfare of its members. Indirectly a partial responsibility for almost all the funds would tend to be laid upon the same body, partly because its continuity would secure the trusts, and partly for the reason that in a small community the men of wealth and standing who would naturally be sought as the guardians of trusts would inevitably be members of the Gild.

But while the nature of the Records compels us to see in this the principal reason for their preservation, there is another consideration which permits us not to be content with it as the only reason, and to discern also traces of a new conception of the borough and burghal life. It is to be found in that grouping of the charters, which marks, quite as distinctly as the preservation of records, the difference between the first and second periods of the town's history. The second group of charters has two outstanding features which distinguish it from the first; the series of Letters

PLATE I. FIFTEENTH-CENTURY ARCH

Patent of Confirmation, of which it is composed, is homogeneous, and it is continuous. The Letters Patent of Edward III, obtained in 1351, are followed in the series by similar Confirmations purchased from the Chanceries of Richard II, Henry IV, Henry V, Henry VI, Edward IV, and Henry VII.¹ Thus only the reign of Richard III is omitted, since we need not consider the brief reign of Edward V. The corpus of the Letters Patent is the same throughout; each document in turn recites as its substantive portion the two charters of Henry II.

It is not too much to deduce from these two features of the series an advance in the clearness, though not in the scope, of the burgensic body's conception of its position. We have left behind that indeterminate outlook which had returned from the first Royal confirmations to a belated manorial confirmation; and had also allowed the town to remain outside the vigorous movement of the boroughs in general during the thirteenth century. Even yet there is no sign of mistrust of the sufficiency of the existing grants. Recital of the charters of Henry II bestowed no more than the set of franchises examined in the previous chapter. But the making of a different kind of effort to render them secure and to maintain them constantly means that the burgensic body was regarding itself in a new light, even if it continued to regard its functions in the old light.

The existence of this body as a distinct entity formed within the general body of inhabitants, and enjoying the description 'Burgess' as a title, is established beyond doubt very soon after the opening of our second period. In a conveyance of 1367 Robert le Cotelir is described as 'Senior Burgensis de Boreford', a formula which would have had next to no meaning unless the Burgesses were an official group. In seventy-five conveyances dated before the end of the fifteenth century only five cases of the application of the description 'Burgensis' are to be found; and in seven cases in which the property conveyed is specifically written down as a burgage the owners are not described as 'Burgensis'.

In view of this limited use of the word the evidence of the phraseology of the Letters Patent becomes conclusive. Those of Richard II confirm the existing liberties 'hominibus et Burgensibus de Bureford . . . prout iidem homines et Burgenses libertatibus et consuetudinibus predictis rationabiliter uti et gaudere consueverunt'. This duality of address is not found in any earlier charter, and implies that there was now in the town some recognizable recipient of liberties other than the whole body of inhabitants. The Letters Patent of Henry IV move a step further in making the Confirmation 'hominibus et Burgensibus de Bureford et successoribus suis . . . prout iidem homines et Burgenses et antecessores sui libertatibus et consuetudinibus', &c. A formal entry of successors and predecessors is not usual in documents of the Chancery except in relation to an official body possessing legal permanence. Finally, a charter of Henry VII, bestowing a fair upon the town in addition to the one already belonging to the lord of the manor, is granted 'dilectis ligeis nostris Ballivis Burgensibus et inhabitantibus ville nostre de Bourford'. Short of specific incorporation, these documents go as far as is possible in recognizing a definite official status in the Burgesses.

The identification of the Burgensic body with the Gild also passes now beyond doubt. One of the difficulties of identification in the first period is that nowhere, except in the early charters, is there any mention of the Gild in documents of the period. The reason may be that in documents originating outside the town itself, as was the case with all the documents upon which we have to rely for that period,¹ the official group was naturally recognized rather by its function—that is to say, as a Court and as discharging the duties of a borough, as a Curia and Burgenses—than by its constituting principle, that is to say, as a Gild. When, however, we come to documents originating inside the town, references to the burgensic body are much more likely to bear traces of its primary form ; more especially when the contents are concerned with religious and charitable bequests.

The use of the term 'Gild' is, in fact, frequent ; and fortunately in several instances in such conjunction with the word 'Burgesses', or with borough matters, as to leave no reasonable doubt of identity. A lease of 1404 is granted by persons specifically described as officers of the Gild, the rent is to be received by the Proctors of the Gild, and the tenant is to be allowed to cut wood for the repair of the house 'with the advice and consent of the Gild'. But the lease is made 'with the assent of all the Burgesses of the town'.¹ Now the Gild can have been under no necessity to consult the wishes of the general body of the inhabitants or burgage tenants ; nor, if the advice of 'the Gild' (not merely the officers of the Gild) were sufficient for the cutting of timber, can any one outside the Gild have had any legal interest in the lease. Consequently the provision of the assent of 'all the Burgesses of the town' must mean that the Burgesses were co-extensive with the Gild.

Almost equally strong is the evidence of a phrase in the bequest of the Novum Hospitium Angulare in 1422² to Thomas Spycer with reversion to church purposes. Here reference is made to 'capella beate marie in eodem cimeterio que est burgi'. The Chapel of Blessed Mary was the Gild Chapel. This method of describing it shows clearly that the 'burgus' as an entity was regarded as synonymous with the Gild.

In the lease of 1404, quoted above, one of the officers mentioned is 'Senescallus Gilde'. In a lease of 1465 an officer is described as 'Seneschal of Burford'.³ There is no evidence of the existence at any time of two Seneschals ; so that apparently an officer could be equally well described as an officer of the Gild or as an officer of the town.

³ Burford Records, bundle A, CH 16.

Evidence of a rather different kind is provided by a conveyance of the Fifteen Lands dated 1382.¹ This piece of property was held on trust for the purpose of relieving the burden upon the town when a tax of tenths or fifteenths was levied. That would be business of the town at large, and no charge is made upon the rents, in this or any other document concerning the trust, for religious or Gild purposes. Yet the conveyance is made by the two heads of the Gild 'consensu fratrum nostrorum dicte Gilde'.

It is true that, unless the later Corporation of Burford could be definitely classed as of the Gild type, this evidence might still leave room for the view that there were really two bodies growing up—a Gild and a Court of Burgesses, only identified by the accidental circumstance that in a small town the same group of leading men would tend to form both bodies. But since the Corporation at its highest development bears all the characteristics of a Gild—being a close, self-electing body, with an Alderman as its head, discommuning members for breach of its rules, and describing itself formally as a Fellowship of Burgesses—the evidence just given is enough to establish the identification as essential and not merely accidental.

For our knowledge of the organization and constitution of the burgensic body at this period we are forced, in the absence of any early customals or records of the proceedings of the Gild or the Court, to rely upon such casual information as is given by the ancient conveyances and leases.

There is as yet no instance of the use of the term 'Alderman' or of any other term singling out an individual as head of the Burgesses. The only hint of any position of leadership in the Gild is to be found in three references to persons described as 'Seniors'. In 1367 Robert le Cotelir is called 'Senior Burgensis de Boreford';² in 1382 John Wenryche and Thomas Spycer are described as 'Senior Gilde Borfordie' and 'Senior dicte Gilde' respectively ;¹ in 1404 Thomas Spycer again is described as 'Gilde Senior'.² But this was hardly the title of a chief officer. At later dates, after the establishment of an Alderman as head of the Corporation, there are still references to the Seniors ; for instance, in the Rules of 1605 the Burgesses are bidden to 'give reverence and place to the Senyors and elder brethren according to the oulde and Auncyente custome of this said Brotherhoode'. The title and status of a Senior evidently did not pass into that of the Alderman ; and therefore he cannot have been in the same sense head of the Corporation. Probably the system was simply that, in order to meet the practical requirements of having certain people to keep the Common Box, to take the lead at meetings of the Burgesses, and to act in any matter touching the dignity or internal well-being of their company, two at least of the older members were regarded and spoken of as Seniors, and exercised in that way a kind of authority.

This would account for the small number of references to the Seniors. If they had held a more formal headship, there would have been more numerous instances of use of the title in documents, partly for the extra validity conferred thereby upon the transaction, partly as a supplementary dating of the deed. Neither purpose would be effectively served by the mention of a position which was little more than an arrangement of convenience, and would by its very nature be held for long by the same men.

The truth is that the Bailiffs were the real heads of the town. For they presided in the Borough Court ; and thus discharged the duties which are of the essence of the chief officer of a town—those of a chief magistrate. They are the only officers who make any appearance among the charters : that of Henry VII already quoted is a grant ' Ballivis Burgen-sibus et inhabitantibus de Bourford '. A letter from Warwick the King-maker, during his lordship of the manor, is addressed to ' the Bailiffs and Burgesses '. This was, in fact, throughout the whole career of the Corporation the normal description in use. It may be added that the position of the Bailiffs comes out in less deliberate ways in the Records. They are the only officers of whom a systematic list was ever kept ; from 1504 to 1861 the list, with a few intervals, is complete. It is significant, too, that the earliest list appears in a Memorandum Book the keeping of which began in 1554. That is to say, at the time of the highest development of the Corporation some trouble was taken to go back over a period of fifty years to recover the names of Bailiffs ; but nothing of the kind was attempted for the Aldermen.

² Burford Records, bundle DD, S 4. It is the form of this last reference which justifies the reading of the word Senior in the other cases as a title in conjunction with the words Burgensis or Gilde, and not in conjunction with the name of the man in each case as a distinction from another person of the same name but younger. In any event the former reading would be the more probable, since the distinction between an elder and a younger man is usually only made when the younger is intended to be understood, the word Junior being added. But all doubt is set at rest by this occurrence of the word Senior after the word Gilde, and not after the man's name.

To minor officials very few references are to be found. There were Proctors or Pronotours, who discharged the duties of the Chamberlains of a later date in receiving and sometimes also in disposing of the rents of property held for public purposes.¹ A single instance occurs of the mention of Chamberlains as such.² There was also a Serjeant.³ But the most important of the minor officials was evidently the Seneschal or Steward. The earliest reference to this office is in 1404, when it was held by Henry Coteler ;⁴ and as Robert le Cotelir had been Senior Burgess in 1367 it is clear that the post of Seneschal was not below the dignity of the more important families of the town. Still more remarkable is a reference of 1465 in which Sir Robert Harecourte appears as Seneschal.⁵ But that remains the sole instance of the holding of the office by a man of rank.

While we are thus rather more definitely informed of the nature of the body of Burgesses, and officials of the town, we remain almost completely in the dark as to their public functions. No book of record, or fragment of such a book, survives to reveal to us the Burgesses at their periodical meetings or at the sittings of the Court.

We have to be content with being able to see that they must have had such functions, and were steadily leaving behind the status of a Gild and approximating to that of a Borough authority. Evidence of this advance is provided by two features in the organization of the town. The first is the absence throughout this period of an Alderman. If the Gild influence had been the guiding principle, a period of such length, especially when coinciding with a notable increase in wealth, could not have passed without a single reference to the characteristic chief officer of a Gild. When we find that, on the contrary, the tendency was clearly towards regarding the Bailiffs, the characteristic Borough chief officers, as at the head of the Burgesses, the reasonable conclusion is that the latter were more occupied in Borough affairs than in purely Gild affairs.

The second feature is the increasing formality of this conjunction of the Bailiffs and Burgesses. In our first period the position of the Bailiffs was seen to be at the best equivocal, and on occasion capable of being treated as wholly manorial. Some trace of this uncertainty may be discerned in the fact that not until 1435 do the names of Bailiffs appear upon leases or conveyances of the town or charity lands. There may have been a reluctance to admit to participation in such business officers whose association with it might have been used by some lord of the manor as an acknowledgement of a right of interference on his part. But as the fifteenth century progresses, the participation of the Bailiffs becomes more and more frequent. When to this kind of conjunction is added that of the charter of Henry VII and the letter of the Earl of Warwick, it may be concluded that the Bailiffs on their side were tending to find their authority rather in their headship of the Borough than in their connexion with the lord of the manor.

We have two sidelights of another kind upon the position which the Burgesses were coming to occupy in the town.

One is given by the subject of Warwick's letter. There had been in Burford from an early date a small foundation of a religious nature, the Hospital of St. John the Evangelist. Among the few references to it are two concerning the appointment of a new Master of the Hospital. In 1327 an entry in the Close Rolls records the admission to the Mastership of Robert le Glasiere, one of the brethren, the presentation of Robert being made on this occasion by the brethren to the King, 'by reason of the lands of Hugh le Despenser and Eleanor his wife being in the King's hands'.¹ Again, in 1389 the Crown appointed one of the Royal clerks, also at a time when the manor was in the hands of the King, under the attainder of Thomas le Despenser.² One other record of presentation has been found; but on these two alone the patronage can be attributed to the lord of the manor, and to no one else. Yet the letter from the Earl of Warwick preserved among the Burford Records, requests of the Bailiffs and Burgesses that they will allow him the next presentation.³ In itself the patronage can have had no importance; the Hospital was of little value and no influence. All that is interesting is the indication that the right to the patronage had evidently been neglected during the fifteenth century by those to whom it belonged, and that in these circumstances the position of the Burgesses was such that they stepped in and assumed it without question.

The other sidelight is given by the bequest of one Thomas Pole or Poole, citizen and tailor of London, in 1500. He gave two messuages, a close and dovecot, and twenty-two acres in the common fields, to be put in feoffment to the Burgesses with the intent that after a small weekly dole to the poor in the Almshouse the rents should be bestowed for the good continuance of the fraternity, especially by the provision of funds for paying the Chancery fees for the confirmation of the charters, and thereafter for any purpose thought by the Burgesses to be for the common good of the town.⁴ Now in one sense this bequest seems to differ very little from trusts which the Burgesses were already administering. But there is just enough difference in the special concern for the charters and in the recognition of the Burgesses' discretion as to the common good of the town to separate this from the old Gild bequests and trusts, and to make of it rather more of a Borough trust.

But when the utmost has been extracted from the documents available for this period, the result is still vague and formless. The most that can be said is that the dimly descried group of Burgesses of our first period has undergone just enough definition of outline and modification of character to prepare the way in some degree for that display of authority which the ampler records of the next century will reveal. Although the only public activity of the Burgesses of which we have so far any record is no more than the administration of public property, and of that property only one item, the Fifteen Lands (with the addition at the very end of the period of Poole's Lands), can be regarded as other than the old charitable work of a Gild, yet the burghal character of the body has been strengthening and the Gild character weakening. Slight as the indications may be, the most has to be made of them, since otherwise the developments of the next century would be so startling as to be almost incapable of explanation.

CHAPTER III

THE CORPORATION AT ITS ZENITH: 1500-1600

§ I

At the very outset of the sixteenth century, and on the most superficial survey of the Records, a distinct change is apparent. Not only are the documents far more numerous, but they also begin to include Records of a class not found in previous centuries, and at the same time the Records of a less important class, such as those which have hitherto been the sole sources of information, are so much changed both in content and form as almost to take rank with true Borough records.

The second of these points is obviously the most significant. But the other two are not without weight. An increase in the number of documents preserved means that the duties which had first dictated the keeping of muniments had become more systematic and more continuous; and this in turn means that the body in charge of the duties had become aware in a new way of its own continuity and corporate responsibility. This is, in fact, put beyond doubt by the third feature of this new period in the Records—the change in their content and form.

There were by this time four classes of property held in trust. Firstly, there were lands and tenements given to the Church; secondly, lands and tenements belonging to the Gild; thirdly, the Fifteen Lands held for the relief of the burden of taxation; and fourthly, Poole's Lands. It is remarkable that in every one of these classes we come during the early part of the sixteenth century upon a document containing a specific declaration of the nature of the trust. This cannot be an accidental circumstance. It must imply that in each case, as it became necessary to re-convey the property owing to the death of previous feoffees, opportunity was taken to put the trust upon record. For Church and Gild property this was done in 1502, 1508, 1512, 1537, and 1538; for the Fifteen Lands in 1546; and for Poole's Lands in 1502 and 1530. Moreover, in each case, while the body of the conveyance is still in Latin, the declaration of the 'intent' of the conveyance is written in English. The nature of the trust was therefore being declared to the public, and was not stated for legal purposes.

So much for the change of content; the change in form is slighter but not to be missed. More care is taken to record the official standing of new feoffees. This begins to be traceable towards the end of the preceding century; but it is a constant feature of the feoffments of the sixteenth century—so constant that it may almost be said to have been a rule that Burgess-ship should be a qualification for appointment as a feoffee. There is also a very marked tendency to enlarge the numbers of the men put in charge of the properties. Towards the end of the century the bodies of feoffees become almost unwieldy; but quite at the beginning they show a departure from the old practice of being content with the nomination of two or three men. Many of the fifteenth-century documents might, so far as the form goes, be private conveyances in the ordinary processes of sale. It is, indeed, difficult in some instances to be quite sure of the stage at which the property actually passed to public uses. No document of the sixteenth century is open to any such doubt; the public nature of those connected with the town or charity lands is fully apparent.

The inferences to be drawn from these new qualities in documents of the older class are such that, although Records of the regular Borough type do not occur till after the middle of the century, we need not, in our view of the corporate body and its work, be at pains to distinguish between stages in this period. We can take the century as a whole, since, even if the facts are actually drawn from documents of the latter half, there is none which could not reasonably be predicated of such a body as the other documents allow us, though in less detail, to perceive.

The Corporation, reaching now the full development of its type, consisted of an Alderman, a Steward, and a number of

34 HISTORY OF THE CORPORATION OF BURFORD

Burgesses, usually fourteen or fifteen.¹ The Alderman seems to have held office for life, or until he resigned, and not to have been an annually elected chief officer. Six men are to be found described in various documents as Alderman in the course of the century: Peter Eynesdale in 1530 and 1537, Richard Manyngton in 1540 and 1553, Simon Wisdom in ten years at short intervals between 1559 and 1581, Richard Chadwell in 1586 and 1589, William Symonds in 1596, and Richard Merywether in 1598 and 1599.² Now it is true that the mention of any one man in two separate years as Alderman need not mean that he held office all the time between those years; two documents might happen to coincide with two entirely distinct tenures of an annual office by, let us say, Peter Eynesdale. But it is rather too much to suppose that the same coincidence should occur in the cases of three other Aldermen in the same century; and altogether too much to suppose that it could have happened ten times in the case of Simon Wisdom. In no instance does the name of any other holder of the office interpose between two mentions of the same man as Alderman. The facts accord with no view except that the Alderman was not annually elected, but held office continuously. Thus he is revealed as rather a Gild official than a Borough officer, and the Corporation is seen at its highest point as deriving its organization from the original Gild Merchant.

The Steward—probably the official who has previously appeared as the Marshal and the Seneschal—was the second officer of the Corporation, and he also seems to have held office indefinitely. This case is not so clear as that of the Alderman, because there are not so many consecutive references to the same holder of the office. Richard Hans in 1540, Simon Wisdom in 1553, Edmund Sylvester in 1566, occur only in these single instances as Stewards. John Hans, however, is described as Steward on six occasions between 1568 and 1581, again without the interposition of any other name during that period ; and Symon Symons, who was Steward in 1598 and 1599, held the post also in 1605.¹ Naturally the Stewardship would be less likely to be held for life than the chief dignity of the Corporation. For one thing, the Steward might rise to the higher rank ; three of the Stewards of the sixteenth century did so rise. Failing that, he would be more likely to resign after some years an office which involved as much attention to duty as that of the Alderman, but was less highly regarded. There is enough evidence to lead to the opinion that at any rate he was not, any more than the Alderman, annually elected.

Minor officers of whom we have record are the town clerk, the serjeant, the constables, and the wardsmen. The town clerk's duties were mainly at the Borough Court. The one reference to the appointment of a new clerk does not make clear who appointed him, but the form of it implies that it was the Corporation. He received an annual fee of 13s. 4d. from the Bailiffs and took the 'profits of the Courts';² he also made an income out of such business as the drawing up of feoffments for the town and charity lands. The serjeant also was a town's officer, being paid by the Corporation.³

The constables and the wardsmen, on the other hand, retained much of the character of manorial officials. The manner of appointment of the constables was that four 'honest inhabitors' were nominated by the Burgesses to the steward of the lord of the manor at the annual law-day, and he selected two to serve for the following year. The duties of the wardsmen, of whom there were four, were to bring in writing to the Steward at the annual law-day a statement of the 'deffawtys' committed during the year in their respective wards.⁴ Thus neither constables nor wardsmen were true Borough officers.

There is only one reference to ale-tasters and clerks of the market.⁵ They were apparently not quite the subordinate officials that they were apt to be in other towns. The names of one of the ale-tasters and one of the clerks of the market in 1596 are found on the list of Burgesses in 1599. The single reference to them records a swearing-in by the Bailiffs at the Borough Court, which would make them Borough officials and not manorial.

The general body of Burgesses retained, as strongly as its chief officers, the marks of its Gild origin. It was constituted by close election within the body, and new members paid an entrance fee of 20s.¹ There was a rota of seniority, since in one case the new Burgess 'in consideracyon of his towardnes was placed in Senyoryte next to John Lymme then beyng one of the Baylyffes of the towne'.² The chief object of the rota may have been to secure that the responsibility of taking the office of Bailiff was properly laid upon each Burgess in turn. But it also conferred a certain dignity and right to precedence on public occasions.

This account of the Corporation differs mainly in positiveness of statement from those which can be put together out of the documents of earlier periods. The constitution of the Burgess body has been made clearer by the greater mass and improved character of the sixteenth-century Records. When we come to deal with the Bailiffs, on the other hand, the striking feature is not the more extended view of their function, but the complete change in the nature of their relation to the town on the one side and the lord of the manor on the other.

The formal mode of their appointment remained the same. The record of the Court held at Burford in 1546, when the manor was in the hands of the Crown, contains the entry : And thereon the bailiffs aforesaid came and placed their offices in the hands of the King on which the Seneschal of the King elected in their places Robert Payne and William Hewys to perform the duties in the proper way and to perform them for one year and they took oath.³

³ Court Rolls (P. R. O.), Portf. 197, no. 15. This is, unfortunately, the only Burford Court Roll I have been able to find.

But the significance of the formal appointment must by this time have become entirely obscured. Throughout the sixteenth century the Bailiffs' office appears to be wholly identified with the interests of the Burgesses, and their duty to be owed to the town alone. This fact can be traced both directly in the tenor and phrasing of certain documents, and indirectly in the nature of transactions with which the Bailiffs were—rather remarkably—associated.

The charter of Henry VII granting a second annual fair in Burford has already been quoted. It may be referred to again, although it actually belongs to the fifteenth century, because of its bearing upon this altered situation of the Bailiffs. The fair was granted to 'the Bailiffs, Burgesses, and Inhabitants' of Burford, without any reservation to the lord of the manor, and the profits of the fair, together with the profits and fines of a Court of Pie Powder, are specifically given to them. The earlier fair belonged to the lord of the manor.¹ Considering how jealously the right to a fair was guarded, it is not likely that, if the Bailiffs could in any serious degree be identified with the interests of the lord of the manor, the town would have risked associating them with a fair of their own; since there would have been, in that case, a danger of the lord laying some claim through his officials to an interest in the fair.

Even more striking evidence is afforded by the entries of fines inflicted for refusing the office of Bailiff. In the Memorandum Book under date 1561 the following occurs:

yt ys agreyd by the consent of all the bretherne that Rychard Dawby schall pay for his fyne for Reffusing the baylyffe weke thys last yere xs. upon the condicion that he schalle not Reffuse the same the next yere or otherwyse to pay the whole sum wyche ys xls.²

Now in the case of an office to which the appointment was made by the lord's Steward the fines for refusing the office should certainly have been adjudged by and paid to the Steward, according to the usual manorial custom. When we find them being inflicted by the Corporation, it is a fair conclusion that the Bailiffs had ceased to be regarded as manorial officers, and that the lord of the manor was, if not consenting to, at any rate not contesting, their change of status.

As indirect evidence of the change three references are worth quoting. One is in a conveyance of the Bridge Lands in 1571, made by 'Ballivis Libertatis ville de Burford'.¹ 'Bailiffs of the Liberty' is a phrase customarily employed of towns possessing the most complete kind of enfranchisement; and its use here, even though it has no parallel among the Records, implies that the manorial allegiance had become in practice obsolete. It may also be remarked in passing that this view of the Bailiffs holding the Bridge Lands, one of the Burgesses' trusts, shows that there was no longer any tendency to keep them aloof from the Corporation's affairs in mistrust of their divided obligations.

Much the same deduction may be drawn from the fact that on one occasion, in 1561, the office of Bailiff was actually held in conjunction with that of Alderman. True, it is noted that 'Thys presydent hadd never byn seen beffore that any after beyng electyd Alderman to have the office any more of the Bayliffe'.² But that it could have happened once is significant enough, since the combination of the offices would certainly have been avoided by the Burgesses of an earlier date.

But the most striking piece of indirect evidence is given by the first recorded instance of the expulsion of a Burgess from the Fellowship. It is of the year 1591, and the discommuning order is signed first by the Steward of the Fellowship and secondly by the Bailiffs. No doubt the Bailiffs were members of the Fellowship, and would as such be entitled to take part in the expulsion of one of their number. But that they signed as Bailiffs implies that they regarded their official standing as an authority within and of the Fellowship.

period give us for the first time an adequate view. In that capacity they had their corporate existence in the Borough Court, which, like all Borough Courts, was at once a judicial and an executive instrument.

As a court of law¹ it had cognizance of civil actions involving sums of money less than 40s.,² and of criminal cases as a court of first instance. Of the civil cases the greater proportion were actions for debt, but there were also actions for detention of goods and for valuation of goods of which the price had been disputed. The Court could inflict fines for non-appearance, and could issue distrains for the non-payment either of fines or of debts for which judgement had been given. A small fee could be charged for the adjournment of an action at the request of either party to it, but on the other hand there are many entries of adjournments without the payment of a fee. The Court could also award costs in its judgement and distrain for the payment of them.

Actions are frequently entered by or against persons not of the town, and sometimes not of the immediate neighbourhood. There are cases of litigants from as far away as Wiltshire and Berkshire and the more distant parts of Gloucestershire. In several instances both litigants were non-residents. Presumably in all these cases the matter of dispute had arisen in the town, either at the market or the fairs, or, as in one case at least, in connexion with the administration of the goods of a deceased resident.

It is not possible to make out with any clearness from our Records what differences of standing before the Court applied to residents and non-residents respectively. In many cases sureties are entered, sometimes for one of the parties, sometimes for both; but no system can be deduced from the entries. It does seem to be clear that, as was to be expected, no Burgess ever had to provide a surety. It would also be expected that on the other hand every non-resident should appear by surety, since the Court would require a security in cases in which it obviously would be unable to issue distraint. There are, indeed, very few cases of non-residents appearing without sureties, and in several of these the matter in dispute was settled out of hand, by agreement between the parties. It may perhaps be concluded that the rule was that non-residents should appear with sureties, but that the rule was often waived where the Court had to do no more than recognize an agreed settlement. The standing of residents who were not Burgesses is even more hazy. On the whole they seem to have been able to appear without sureties, but there are many cases of residents providing sureties, and one in which a resident litigant did so, while the other party, a non-resident, did not. It may be added that any resident might act as surety. From one entry recording that a defendant, non-resident, had not paid the fee of the Court, 'nor for the second Court', it might be supposed that non-residents had this further difference of standing—that they had to pay fees for the hearing of their cases, whereas a resident would have a right of free entrance to the Court. But there is no other reference bearing on this point. Fees can hardly have been chargeable in any case arising from the market or fairs, since it was of the essence of the being of such a Court to be available for such cases. The case in which a fee is mentioned was between two residents in neighbouring villages concerning a debt; the rule may have been that the Court could be appealed to by non-residents in matters not arising within the town when it suited their convenience to make use of a Court near at hand, but in such matters payment of a fee was exacted.

The criminal cases recorded are very few. There are two charges of assault, or 'bloodshed', each of which ended in the taking of bail to keep the peace. One case of petty larceny occurs, the prisoner, a woman, being expelled from the town by the Court on pain of a whipping if she should be brought before the Court again. There is also a case of trespass. The single case of a more serious nature is a charge of sheep-stealing; the end of it is not clear, but apparently the defendant was held to bail, presumably for the Assize.

In this Court the Alderman, Steward, and Burgesses sat with the Bailiffs. But it may be doubted whether their presence was vital to the composition of the Court. The Court Book speaks frequently of judgements of 'the Court', adjournments granted by 'the Court', and evidence given to 'the Court'. On the other hand it speaks also of judgements of the Bailiffs; and in view of references of an earlier date it would seem safer to regard the Bailiffs rather as judges sitting with assessors than as presiding members of a homogeneous body.

The Bailiffs were certainly in judicial matters the executive of the town. The oath for the Steward of the Fellowship charges him to 'assiste the Baylyffs of this towne in the execucon of their office to see Justice mynystered'. They were responsible for the stocks and pillory. It was to the Bailiffs' custody that prisoners sentenced at Assizes in Burford were committed by the Judges.

Of the Court as a burghal executive, on the other hand, the Bailiffs were in no way predominant members. Assessments for Crown Subsidies, whether of Tenths and Fifteenths or special Subsidies for military purposes, as well as assessments charged upon the town for robberies committed and assessments for purely internal affairs such as the repair of the church and the keeping of a poor child, were levied by Burgesses acting without the Bailiffs. It may also be noted that when, in 1557, there was a desire for recording deeds of sale of houses in the town, the record appears not in the Court Book but in the Burgesses' Memorandum Book.

Thus the ampler Records of the sixteenth century enable us to be positive about certain aspects of the development of town life in Burford which have up to this period been rather dimly discernible. That it was in some degree a conscious development may be gathered from a curious entry in the Memorandum Book. It puts on record a definition drawn up by contemporary lawyers of the phrase 'sac and soc and toll and theam and infangenthef' in the first charter of Henry II. This entry must mean that the Burgesses were taking a new kind of interest in the scope of authority that might be claimed under their charters; they wanted to know exactly what legal powers the phrase conferred.

Now conscious questioning by a corporate body of its position is very rare in the history of town government in England. Powers were exercised as the opportunity or the need arose; and the distinctions that modern criticism can draw between one and another aspect of burghal unity have no historical reality. It becomes necessary therefore to find some reason for this manifestation by the Burgesses of Burford of a new interest in their constitution; and a reason can be suggested.

Their existence as a body had originally been determined by the erection under the earliest charters of a Gild; and their continued corporate entity had been assured much more by the administration of Gild affairs than by their association with a Court of which the essence resided in the Bailiffs. In the middle of the sixteenth century—just before the date of the significant entry in the Memorandum Book—the course of national events suddenly interrupted this channel of continuity.

The first of those sequels of the Reformation which so much affected local life in England, namely the Dissolution of the Monasteries, need concern us here very little. The Hospital of St. John the Evangelist, the sole religious foundation in Burford, was, as has already been said, only a small institution, possessing no more property in the town than a house or two and some closes of land. The Master surrendered the foundation,¹ and it was granted in 1544 to Edmund Harman, one of the King's Barber Surgeons.² He also obtained in 1546 a grant of the Rectory of Burford, the one other piece of monastic property here, which had belonged to the Abbey of Keynsham.³ But these grants had no effect upon the town, for the passage of ecclesiastical property into lay hands did not mean here the advent of a new lord of the manor. The Priory had never had any manorial rights in Burford. Even when Harman, a few years later, added to his possessions some manorial rights, the town remained unaffected. His lease was only of the agricultural portion of the manor, which had always been outside the scope of the charters,¹ and he was never lord of the town. The Dissolution therefore brought no disturbance to the Corporation.

But another Act of confiscation followed which must have given it a severe shock. This was the Act of Edward VI, dissolving the Gilds and Chantries and alienating their possessions to the Crown. The Fellowship of the Alderman, Steward, and Burgesses had indeed passed in practice far enough beyond the limitations of its Gild origin, however clear the Gild type remained in its constitution, to escape absolute extinction. It was not now a Gild within the meaning of the Act—a body existing solely for mutual benevolence, the maintenance of a chapel, and the observance of obits. Yet there was hardly a single piece of its property which was not held, so to speak, on Gild terms, that is to say, which did not impose upon the Fellowship, as a condition of holding the property, the duty of observing an anniversary, of paying a priest for the saying of memorial Masses, or at the least of making some annual payment for the upkeep of lights or other accessories of church services classed by this Act as superstitious. Even Poole's Lands, given as they were for the benefit of the Corporation and the maintenance of its charters, were subject to a direction that the people in the Almshouse, who were to be the recipients of a small weekly dole, should pray for the souls of Thomas Poole and his wife; and that apparently unimportant phrase was enough to vitiate the obviously secular intentions of the testator and bring his bequest under the Act.

The result was that the Burgesses found themselves stripped of all that property, the administration of which had provided them with their most continuous public activity and their strongest impulse towards cohesion. The process appears to have been a gradual one. For a considerable time after the passing of the Act some of the properties continued to be administered by the Burgesses; a few were successfully defended against the claims of the Crown's officers, and one or two pieces were never brought to question.¹ But on the whole the effects of the Act were sweeping, and during the latter half of the sixteenth century the Records show an almost complete blank in that series of leases and enfeoffments which previously provided our chief material for knowledge of the borough system.

Here, then, is a very natural explanation of the sudden appearance in the Memorandum Book of a definition of the jurisdiction conferred by the sac and soc phrase. The entry is not dated, but from its position in the book it must have been made after 1560, and it was between 1560 and 1570 that the alienation of the charity lands became most stringent. The Burgesses, finding that nothing was left to them as a Gild to administer, had a new concern for that other sphere in which their entity subsisted, the work of the Borough Court.

This entry does just allow us to go so far as to discern in the Burgesses a consciousness of two distinct spheres of activity, and a deliberate turning from one to the other. But the distinction can hardly be made before it is obliterated again; the turning from one sphere to the other had been merely by force of circumstances, and the Burgesses set themselves to correct the circumstances. It would appear to a modern mind that, so long as the Borough Court remained secure, the town's corporate vitality was ensured; and, indeed, that any circumstances which tended to concentrate the existence of the Burgess body rather in the Court than in charity administration were for the good of the town and required no correction. But the slight distinction which the Burgesses evidently made did not amount to any perception of such differences. They were incapable of perceiving the constitutional distinction between themselves as administrators of town lands and themselves as members of the Borough Court. All their functions were to them upon the same plane of corporateness, if the phrase may be allowed, and none of them could be lost with equanimity.

It is necessary therefore to pursue further the history of the charity lands. In detail it is rather obscure. No document gives a list of the property at the moment of confiscation; we have to derive our knowledge of what happened from the grants of confiscated estate made to individuals by the Crown, and from some proceedings of the Court of Exchequer,¹ until in the year 1599 the town Records become again our source of information after the recovery by purchase of most of the lost lands and tenements. The documents in the Public Record Office are confusing, and it is almost impossible to identify all the various pieces of property at all the stages. But a rough outline of events can be given.

The bulk of the property passed into the hands of private individuals having previously no connexion with Burford, who may be said in modern phrase to have taken it as a speculation. The first of these, Richard Venables, sold eight lots to a Burford man, which thus became private property and ceased to serve charitable purposes. Venables obtained his grant in 1549 at twenty-five years' purchase. He evidently let the speculation drop, for several of his properties appear, together with others not previously granted, in the next speculation, when in 1563 two men named Smith and Devyse obtained a sixty-years' lease from the Crown. They seem to have sold none of the property, but again to have let their speculation drop, since after twenty-seven years of their lease had run the property was granted to two other men named Typper and Dawe.

Meanwhile, in 1567, proceedings were taken in the Court of Exchequer concerning a few houses and pieces of land which had escaped confiscation. They were claimed by the Crown, but without success, and remained in the hands of local feoffees. Some of these were put to a use calculated to protect them against further claims by the Crown, being made part of the foundation endowment of the Grammar School in 1571. Other portions, in spite of the verdict of the Court of Exchequer, were included by Typper and Dawe in their application for lands and passed into their possession.

The final stage in these transactions was reached in 1598, when the Burgesses recovered nearly all the old charity lands by purchase from Typper and Dawe. In each group of the charities the series of leases and conveyances, interrupted at the middle of the century, begins again in 1599 with a conveyance by two of the prominent Burgesses, Richard Merywether and Toby Dallam, to certain other Burgesses, the conveyance being made by Merywether and Dallam 'in discharge of the trust and confidence reposed in them by their fellows'. This phrase is explained by an entry in one of the Corporation Account Books, in which a list of the charity lands dated 1600 is prefaced by the statement that the lands and tenements had been purchased by Simon Green, Richard Merywether, and Toby Dallam 'whoe were putt in trust for the purchase thereof Amountinge to the some of fower score pounds'. The Burgesses had clearly subscribed for the repurchase of the properties.

They proceeded at once to re-establish the charities in a way which shows considerable business ability. The property must all have been in a very bad condition. Even in 1563 most of it is described as ruinous; and although Smith and Devyse obtained their grant on easy terms upon an undertaking to effect the necessary repairs, it is certain from later documents that neither they nor Typper and Dawe did more than the minimum required to keep the houses standing. The Burgesses dealt with this state of affairs by leasing the houses, not directly and singly to the occupiers, but in groups to prominent Burgesses. These leases were for long periods, eighty or ninety years, at small rentals, the lessees undertaking repairs. In each case the old leases obtained from the Crown grantees were surrendered, and a fine paid for the new lease, these fines amounting in all to about £100.

By these measures the property was placed in the hands of individuals who could afford to lay out capital on putting the houses into good condition and take interest on their money in the rents received from their sub-tenants. The rents received for the charities from the chief lessees were indeed small; but this was at any rate better than the total suspension of the charities for the preceding fifty years, and better also than leasing the houses, for the sake of immediate rents, to single occupiers in whose hands they would soon fall into a condition in which they would become untenable and produce no rent.

Now in every aspect this re-establishment of the ancient charities is also a deliberate recovery of ground on the part of the Burgess body. There was, to begin with, no particular reason for re-establishing the charities at all. They had, through no fault of the Burgesses, practically ceased to exist, and there is no evidence of any feeling against the conversion of charity lands into private property in the cases in which that happened. The men who found the money for the purchase from Typper and Dawe might just as well have regarded the transaction as a private investment on their own behalf. Or again, granted that they had some charitable intention, they might have founded the charities anew in their own names instead of merely carrying on the old foundations. They followed neither of these lines, but carried the business through simply as a public duty falling upon them as Burgesses.

This, at the close of a century in which they had attained to the complete exercise of functions which we should now recognize as a sufficient expression of corporate borough life, is significant. It means that the Burgesses were incapable of differentiating between one kind of function and another. To them everything which they did or had done as a Burgess body was necessary to their continued existence as a body. The point is important because of its corollary—that of the true borough liberties the Burgesses had a very imperfect appreciation. Unable to distinguish between one kind of function and another, they failed to distinguish between their status in exercising one and their status in exercising the other. Because they were, as the Burgess body, the undoubted authority in the matter of the Charity lands, they assumed that their position in any other duties discharged by them as Burgesses was on the same plane.

It never occurred to them, therefore, to question the efficacy of their charters. They continued throughout the sixteenth century to obtain from the Chancery Letters Patent of Confirmation, which neither expanded the rudimentary charters of Henry II nor in any way gave definition or validity to the corporate constitution. Events were soon to occur which reveal the true character of the apparently great developments of this century.

CHAPTER IV

THE LOSS OF THE FRANCHISES: 1600-1700

THAT the Burgesses themselves were at this time quite unconscious of any uncertainty in their position is well seen in one of the first documents to confront us among the Burford Records of the seventeenth century. A large vellum roll dated January 1605/6 contains 'The Auncyente Ordynances Rules Constytucions and customes of the Corporacion and Fellowshippe of the Burgesses of this Towne and Burroughe of Burfford'.¹ It is the only extant custumal of the town; and although it contains references to earlier enactments of rules and ordinances, there is no reason to suppose that these had ever been reduced into a written constitution in some custumal now lost. The Roll of 1605/6 nowhere speaks of any previous document of the same kind, and nowhere quotes an ancient rule; it only mentions in general terms that there had been such rules.

The first thing, therefore, to be noticed about the Roll is that the Burgesses of Burford were singularly late in providing themselves with a written constitution. From this we may deduce that they had also been late in taking upon themselves the exercise of any considerable public duties. The need for such rules as are here inscribed would only become apparent as the Burgesses became more and more a public body whose proceedings affected the general mass of inhabitants outside the limits of their Fellowship. Practically this must mean that, while we need not think of all the developments of the sixteenth century as sudden or unexplained by tendencies of earlier date, it was not until that century that the Burgesses approximated effectively to a town incorporation.

Detailed examination of the Roll shows that they never did more than approximate. The ordinances are not those of a town corporate forming an entity of the realm and responsible to the laws of the realm directly. They are the rules of a body regarding itself as assistant to the chief officers of the borough in the maintenance of peace and order and the administration of law; its relation to the Crown subsisting in the fact that these officers were officials of the Crown—'the Prynce's chiefe officers of this saide Towne' (Article 2). The body is a close one, self-electing (Article 20), and its members are responsible to no one but fellow-members for the discharge of their duties (Articles 7, 16, 17, 18); punishment for breach of the Rules is inflicted by the Fellowship, and fines and fees are paid into a common fund disposable for purposes of the Fellowship (Article 18). The Gild tradition is very strongly present; as for instance in Article 6, forbidding members to 'procure or ingrosse or cause to be procured or ingrossed' from other members houses, lands, or anything 'that ys parte or parcell of their lyvinge'; in Articles 8 and 9 concerning the relief of poor and aged members of the Fellowship and the attendance of members at the funeral of one of their number; and in Articles 10 and 20 providing for reform of the 'great charges' which had fallen upon the Bailiffs and Burgesses at their election in feasting the brethren.

At no point do the Burgesses show themselves as responsible to the townspeople, or as exercising functions on their behalf. The elected officers are responsible to the Fellowship, and modifications of their duties, whether concerning the Fellowship alone or affecting such public matters as the market and tolls, may be made upon the vote of the Fellowship (Article 11). None of the Rules applies to any inhabitant of the borough other than members of the Fellowship, and no control of the borough is contemplated except in administration of the common law by the Crown's officers.

Now it is precisely in the fact that the chief officers of the borough are thus spoken of as the Crown's officers that we are to look for the clue to the Burgesses' view of their position. For the Roll of 1605/6 is at once a correct interpretation of the charters, as it professes to be (Article 1), and a completely mistaken deduction from them. The constitution of the Gild was right and proper; but when the chief officers of the town were described as 'the Prynce's chiefe officers' the Burgesses were being misled by the Crown's tenure of the manor into supposing that their position was as independent of intermediate lordship as a fully chartered borough held at fee-farm from the Crown.

In order to understand the blow which was now to fall upon the place, it is necessary to summarize briefly the past relations between the town and the manorial lords who had owned it. From the time when it became an appanage of the Honour of Gloucester, Burford had been an unimportant item in the possessions of a succession of great lords, none of whom had ever resided in, or even near, the place. From the first Earls of Gloucester it had passed to the De Clares, then to the Despensers, and from them to the Earls of Warwick. Though the agricultural part of the manor had often been in the hands of tenants, the town had nearly always remained in the direct holding of the chief lord; and even when, for a short period, a tenant for life had held the town, he also was a man of considerable possessions, John Giffard of Brimpsfield, who did not reside in the place and had no close relations with it.¹

The inevitable result of these conditions was that, as the Burgesses, advancing in importance and capability, began to take more share in the affairs of the town, they would be confronted by no very strict assertion of the manorial supremacy. Constantly associated with the work of the Borough Court and with the supervision of the market, they would tend gradually, and perhaps even unconsciously, to regard these as their own Court and market. The way in which the interests of the Bailiffs came to be identified with the town rather than with the lord of the manor is a very distinct sign of this tendency. When, at the end of the fifteenth century, the manor passed into the hands of the Crown, the process of encroachment on the manorial rights must have been much accelerated. The Records of the century show that in almost every department the Burgesses were in effective occupation of what did not belong to them. The Bailiffs excused from office pay their fine to the Burgesses. The Borough Court profits are allotted to the clerk of the Court as his remuneration. The Burgesses let the stalls in the market and fix the market tolls. They even went so far, in one curious instance, as to deal with the waste inside the town, levying fines on the inhabitants of Sheep Street for the sheep pens erected on the open spaces before their houses.¹ Not one of the sources of burghal profit had been held at a rent from the lord; the proceeds had, as we have seen, been paid direct to him. The only conclusion to be drawn from the sixteenth-century Records is that, under a remote and weakening manorial control, this money had begun to find its way into the common box of the Burgesses.

Now when a town in these circumstances happened, by the accidental conditions of the tenure of the manor, to have its chief officers appointed by the Crown, it was natural that the Burgesses should fall into the belief that they were as other boroughs responsible to the Crown and forget their manorial status. They could not possibly have the constitutional knowledge to distinguish between the appearance and the reality. Events were now to bring it home to them in a disastrous manner.

In 1601 the Crown alienated the town and manor of Burford by sale to Sir John Fortescue, for a long period Chancellor of the Exchequer under Queen Elizabeth. This transaction had no more immediate effect upon the place than the ancient lordships had had, and for the same reason. Fortescue was a very rich man, whose chief seat was at Saldan in Buckingham-shire; and since there was no manorial mansion at Burford he probably did not concern himself much with the town. With him, however, the long disjunction of Burford and its lords ended. His executors sold the town and manor in 1617 to Sir Lawrence Tanfield, who was already resident at Burford, being described in the deed of sale as 'of the Priory near Burford'.¹

Thus at a late date, and by an accidental combination of tenures, the Dissolution of the Monasteries was to have here the same effect as it had immediately and directly elsewhere—the introduction of a new lord. Harman had never resided at the Priory, probably because the old religious building must have been poor and insignificant, and he could not, or did not care to, spend money on the erection of a mansion; nor had he ever obtained the lordship of the town. Tanfield, rich enough to build a great house and to add to his importance by acquiring the lordship of the town, became the first resident lord of the manor Burford had had since the Norman Conquest.²

In any case such a change would necessarily have brought about some difficulties in a town whose Burgesses had acquired the exercise of their functions so largely by default of the manorial control. But it was peculiarly unfortunate for Burford that the change came with a man like Tanfield. Corrupt and avaricious in his public life, he was grasping and overbearing as a territorial lord. In his other manor of Great Tew he seized upon lands and rights to which his tenants' title was not in dispute. He was not likely to spare the rights of Burgesses whose position was, to say the least, open to very serious question.

Within two years of his purchase of the lordship of the town and manor of Burford the Burgesses, in the persons of six of their number, were put on their defence in the Court of Exchequer by a writ of Quo Warranto on the charge of usurping certain liberties and privileges to which they had no title. Tanfield's name appears nowhere in the record of the case. The proceedings were instituted on information lodged by the Attorney-General, Sir Henry Yelverton. But there can be little doubt that Tanfield had set the case in motion. To begin with, there was no particular reason why the Burgesses' position should be called in question just at this time, except that a new lord had entered upon the manor, and manorial dues had been usurped by the Burgesses. Secondly, there is evidence in connexion with his other manor that this new lord was very far from being complaisant or mild in his holding of a manor; a petition of the inhabitants of Great Tew to the House of Lords complains that he had interfered with common rights there, had enclosed pieces of tenants' lands, stopped rights of way, and so on.¹ It may be that the petition is not wholly to be relied on, but it could not have been made without some reasonable grievance behind it; and even if Tanfield had been within his rights, the petition shows—what is enough for our present purpose—that he sharply exacted his rights. In other words, he would have been likely to assert his rights in Burford, and to institute proceedings such as those which took place. Thirdly, local tradition has always pointed to Tanfield as the cause of the town's loss of liberties; this would be unimportant if it were not that the proceedings against the Burgesses were such as would be instituted by the lord of the manor, and that this lord of the manor was precisely the kind of man to institute them.

The reason why his name does not appear in the record of the case is obvious. He was, as Chief Baron of the Exchequer, the presiding judge in the Court before which the case came. It began on June 17, 1620 (Trinity Term, 18 James I), and judgement on the various points was given by degrees, the final points receiving judgement a year later, on June 16, 1621. A transcript of the judgements is among the Burford Records.² It sets forth that, on an information lodged by the

- xi. The right to try in that Court all cases involving a sum of less than 40s., to administer oaths in the hearing of cases and to examine witnesses on oath ;
- xii. The right to make statutes and by-laws and to fine or imprison persons for breaches thereof ;
- xiii. The right to put persons on oath to keep the by-laws.

Now if we set against this list the list of privileges which Tanfield had bought from Fortescue and Fortescue from the Crown, as set out in the deeds of sale and in the Letters Patent which Tanfield obtained from James I in confirmation of his purchase, the reason for these proceedings of Quo Warranto is quite clear. The privileges thus alienated by the Crown to the new lords of the manor included, with the manor and borough, the market and the fair of St. John the Baptist with their stallage and tolls, the Stewardship of the borough with the profits of the Courts, and the right to waifs and strays and felons' goods. Clearly the Crown had regarded itself as owning these privileges and profits by right of the manor, and Tanfield, in view of his purchase deed and Letters Patent, cannot be blamed for bringing to question the Burgesses' occupation of them.

Some of the impeached privileges were not defended at all by the Burgesses. The right to appoint a Deputy Alderman, the power to administer oaths to witnesses in the Borough Court and to examine them on oath, the right to imprison for breaches of the by-laws, and the right to put persons upon oath to keep the by-laws were abandoned. Whether they were only accidentally omitted from the pleadings for the defence, or whether they were deliberately given up, does not appear. Judgement was forthwith pronounced, seizing these privileges into the hands of the Crown and inhibiting the defendants from exercising them.

On the other points the defence was twofold, consisting first of the import of the Letters Patent of Edward III, and secondly of the plea that the Bailiffs, Alderman, and Burgesses had exercised these franchises from time of which the memory of man ran not to the contrary. In other words, the privileges were claimed partly by grant and partly by prescription.

The plea of prescription was referred to a jury. The privileges claimed on this ground were the Saturday market, the two fairs, and the tolls and stallage of the market and fairs. It is obvious that this plea could not hold water. Documents have been quoted in previous chapters which show clearly that market profits and tolls at Burford were reckoned among the revenues of the lords of the manor;¹ and the fair of St. John the Baptist, besides appearing at early dates among those revenues, had been specifically regranted to Hugh le Despenser.² A curious point is that the fair of Holyrood Day was not separately defended in the pleadings. In spite of the fact that this fair had been distinctly granted to the Bailiffs, Alderman, and Burgesses by charter,³ that charter was not put in evidence, and the two fairs were dealt with on the same basis. It may be that the defendants perceived that to produce a separate charter for one fair would react unfavourably upon their claim to the other fair and the market, and decided that all these sources of profit must stand or fall together.

Stand they could not. The Burgesses had certainly not owned these profits time out of mind, and the jury gave a verdict to that effect. The Court gave judgement upon the verdict, and these privileges in turn were seized into the hands of the Crown and the Burgesses were inhibited from the enjoyment of them.

The plea of the charter of Edward III was dealt with by the Court itself. The judgement as recorded is not what would nowadays be called a reasoned judgement, and therefore we do not know on what ground this plea was held invalid by the lawyers of the time. But that it was so held can hardly surprise us. No attempt had ever been made by the Burgesses to obtain a charter which should amplify or render more precise the rudimentary phrases of the first grants from the Crown—the two charters of Henry II. These gave the burgage tenure, set up a market, authorized the establishment of a Gild; and one of them included the sac and soc clause. No charter the Burgesses had ever obtained conferred any other franchise; throughout the whole series the sole effective portion of each document is a recital of the grants of Henry II; and it was upon the first Royal confirmation of them that the defence relied. It was bound to fail, because no clause gave the town to be held by the Burgesses, and no clause conferred upon them any right except as men of a manor. In Henry II's first charter they are 'homines Willelmi comitis Glocestrie de Boreford', and in the second they are 'liberi Burgenses ville comitis Willelmi de Bureford'.

The flaw in the legal position of Burford is very clearly shown by a certain letter from the Corporation of Oxford, which is among the Burford Records.¹ It is dated 25 September, 18 James I (1620), and is a certificate under the Common Seal of Oxford concerning the right of the Mayor and Commonalty of that city to waifs and strays, felons' goods, picage, stallage, and tallage. The Bailiffs, Alderman, and Burgesses of Burford had applied to be certified on these points, according to the usage customary between towns when one had been expressly granted in charters the free customs of another, as was the case here. The Mayor and Commonalty of Oxford replied that they had the rights in question 'as part of that wee hould by fee farme and for which wee pay the same'.¹ In that passage lies the whole difference between the position of Oxford and that of Burford. The Burgesses of Burford had never paid any rent for the sources of profit which they had taken into their hands, and obviously therefore had no right to them.

On considerations presumably of this kind the Court held invalid the plea of charter with regard to the remaining privileges—the right to waifs and strays, the right to elect a Seneschal or Steward, the right to hold a Borough Court, the making of ordinances and by-laws and to impose fines for breach thereof. Judgement was given seizing these franchises also into the hands of the Crown, and inhibiting the Burgesses from the enjoyment of them.

The disaster was complete; but it enables us to see the meaning of the advance in burghal activity during the sixteenth century and the comparative lack of any such activity in the previous century. It had arisen partly from the universal decay of the manorial system after the Wars of the Roses, and partly from the particular circumstances at Burford which had put the manor into the hands of the Crown. The Burgesses, finding themselves acting as a Court and managing a market and fairs without being called to account by any one for the revenues, and then observing that their chief officers were appointed by the Crown, had passed—quite probably without any deliberate intentions of encroachment—into the belief that their position was the same as that of other boroughs which in appearance presented the same conditions. They omitted to notice that in those boroughs the privileges were accompanied by responsibilities—that boroughs under the Crown owed duties to the Crown and paid for their franchises.

The mistake cost them dear. From this time forth Burford has not even the shadow of likeness to the great boroughs. The long series of Letters Patent from the Crown confirming liberties comes to an end with those issued by the Chancery of James I. There are no more Borough Court Books, and no Memorandum Books of any importance.

One thing, indeed, survived the disaster, and that was the Corporation itself. Nothing had passed to prevent the continued existence of a body under the title of the Alderman and Burgesses of Burford. But that existence would probably not have been as long as it actually was, and certainly not as important, if the Burgesses of the sixteenth century had not, by that curious stroke of foresight, taken pains to recover into their hands the ancient Charity Lands. In the control of them the Burgesses had work that held them together and gave them still, in a much modified sense, a public position.

Even this remaining fragment of authority was now to be challenged. In 1628 a Royal Commission, appointed under the Elizabethan Act 'concerning the Misemployment of Lands heretofore given to Charitable Uses', held an inquiry at Burford, and made decrees which were intended to destroy the supremacy of the Burgesses in the management of the charities.

Again, although no motive for the appointment of the Commission appears on the existing records, it is not difficult to discover the reason for the proceedings. This is to be found in the form which the recovery of the Charity Lands had taken. They had been purchased from two men who had obtained a grant of them from the Crown. Now of course the Crown did not grant confiscated lands for nothing, and the Letters Patent of the grant to Typper and Dawe reserved certain quit-rents to the Crown. The same rents were reserved in the deeds of sale to the Burgesses who made the purchase. But the payments to the Exchequer had not been kept up; a document of 1631 shows that they had ceased in 1603.¹ It is hardly to be supposed that the Officials of the Exchequer would allow this state of things to continue for long without an explanation; and it seems, from certain passages in the Commission's decrees, that the Burgesses in reply had questioned the validity of the transactions with Typper and Dawe, pleading that the lands had been wrongfully confiscated and ought never to have been in the hands of the Crown or consequently in the possession of Typper and Dawe. This plea would require investigation, and provides us with a sufficient reason for the appointment of the Commission.

At the same time, the Commission's decrees are so plainly unfriendly to the Burgesses that there may have been also some element of criticism of their control at work to bring about an inquiry. Tanfield had died in 1625. But Lady Tanfield, who was certainly almost as energetic as her husband in the controversies with the tenants of Great Tew, and therefore probably took her share in all that had taken place at Burford, lived until 1628. She may have brought influence to bear upon the Exchequer which caused the Commission to have in mind other considerations than those of the unpaid quit-rents alone, when the inquiry began.

The Decrees, at any rate, are a drastic reconstitution of the charitable trusts over the heads of the Burgesses and a termination of the Burgesses' complete control. Briefly, the Decrees are as follows: The Commissioners first lay it down that the lands under investigation were anciently given upon trust for certain purposes, which they set forth specifically, ordering that for the future the rents shall be used for those purposes alone; secondly, they find that in nearly every case the rents then being received were inadequate, and they order the cancelling of all the long leases granted after the recovery of the lands, with instructions that for the future no leases shall be granted for a longer period than twenty-one years or for rents lower than those which in each instance the Commissioners proceed to fix; thirdly, they find that Typper and Dawe had obtained their Letters

Patent by fraud, the lands not being justly subject to confiscation, and the ancient status of the charities is thereby restored; fourthly, the Commissioners appoint a new body of trustees, including a number of members of county families from the immediate neighbourhood with a limited representation from among the Burgesses.

Of actual misuse of the charities the Commissioners have little to say. One house, the capital messuage of which the rental was a main part of the support of the Almshouse, had been sold outright—a transaction which was, of course, forthwith declared void. Otherwise there is no accusation of technically illegal proceedings. There is only the general implication, alike in the raising of rents and in the cancelling of existing leases and in the appointment of trustees of a new character to lessen the Burgesses' control, that the Corporation had not discharged its duty faithfully, but had taken advantage of the disturbed and equivocal position of the Charity Lands under various Tudor Acts of Parliament to bring into its absolute power property in which it should never have had more than a trust interest.

The cancelling of the transactions with Typper and Dawe is at the root of the whole of the Decrees, and was for the Corporation the vital portion of them. While those transactions remained valid, the rentals received were not altogether unsatisfactory and the long leases had a good reason, for, as we have seen, they were based upon a perfectly comprehensible and not unenlightened policy of paying for the repurchase and placing the property in the hands of responsible men with some inducement to them to repair the houses and keep them well tenanted. If, on the other hand, the property was still subject to the old forms of trust, and had never legally passed out of them, then the Burgesses were to blame for not contesting the fraud of Typper and Dawe, and for the state of disrepair into which their acquiescence had allowed the houses to fall.

Again, if the transactions remained valid, the Commissioners would have been acting in a very high-handed way in appointing a fresh body of trustees and deliberately infusing into it so large a proportion of men outside the Burgess body and even outside the town. Indeed, they might have been acting ultra vires. But once the lands were restored to their ancient basis, the Commissioners could quite properly make any arrangements they chose for the future administration.

Thus in this matter, as in the Quo Warranto proceedings, the Burgesses had brought trouble upon their own heads. If the proper manorial payments had been made to Tanfield, they might have gone on sitting in the Borough Court and otherwise conducting affairs. If the Crown had continued to receive the quit-rents of the recovered Charity Lands—a total sum, after all, of no more than 19s. 2d. a year—the Royal Commission of 1628 might never have been appointed. We need not suppose that it was from greed or parsimony that the payments in either case were withheld. The feeling in the minds of the Burgesses may very well have been rather one of objection to acknowledgement of a higher authority, and of desire to act in complete independence. But that does not render the results of their attitude less disastrous.

The circumstances of the time tended to obscure, a few years later, the effects both of the judgement of 1620-1 and the Decrees of 1628. In general the Civil War has left but the slightest traces on the Burford Records. The place was indeed the scene of a skirmish or two, and of Cromwell's famous handling of the Levellers, so that the register of burials has not escaped the marks of the time. But there are no signs of internal confusion or interruption of the town's life. Two reasons may be assigned for this. One is that the loss of borough privileges would remove any necessity for public decisions of policy or public action in support of either side. The other is that the town was by that time in the hands of a lord of the manor whose official position would quite sufficiently shelter it from the need for decision. Lord Falkland, who had inherited the town and manor with the Priory by his father's marriage with the daughter of Sir Lawrence and Lady Tanfield, sold them in 1637 to William Lenthall, Speaker of

Indirectly, however, the Civil War must have affected one important part of the Decrees of 1628—the part which set up the new body of Trustees. That would in any case have been extremely likely to become a dead letter. It was all very well to appoint county gentry as Trustees; but in practice the actual business of the charities would soon fall back, when the novelty had worn off, into the hands of the resident members of the body, and since those residents would naturally, as men of standing in the town, be Burgesses, the Corporation would in fact recover its control. When events followed which must have sufficiently occupied the minds of the county gentry, if only on the question of how to secure their own property and persons, they would be less and less inclined to spare attention for the affairs of Burford.

Consequently, although the names of the external Trustees appear with all due formality upon the leases of charity property, the detailed management, the reception and disposal of the rents, reverted to the Corporation. The proof of this is to be found in the Account Books of the seventeenth century. There is one of general charity accounts in which the entries run from 1602 to 1658; another containing entries from 1656 to 1737; and a book of school accounts from 1644 to 1735. The whole tenor of the entries is that of management by the Corporation. No record appears of a decision being taken by any meeting of persons other than members of the Corporation; and the accounts are rendered by the Bailiffs to the Burgesses.

The obscuring of the effects of the judgement of 1620-1 came in a different and rather more direct manner. Preserved in company with the series of Letters Patent of Confirmation among the Burford Records are two documents under the Great Seal of the Commonwealth, which did restore some jurisdiction in the town, though not to the town as such. They are commissions issued, the first in 1649 and the second in 1659 after Richard Cromwell had succeeded to the Protectorate, appointing the Bailiffs and Seneschal and two of the ancientest Burgesses of Burford to be Justices of the Peace for the town, in company with William Lenthall (and later John Lenthall, his son, also), and to be responsible for the affairs of the town. This, of course, did not restore the lost corporate jurisdiction nor re-establish the Borough Court. But it gave some semblance of the old activities and the old dignity to the Burgess body, and rendered less obvious the stripping away of their former authority.

The latter part of the seventeenth century, while it was in one respect the beginning of a new era for Burford, brought no revival of burghal functions. In material prosperity the town advanced considerably. The convenience of its position for the Burford Races, inaugurated early in this century, brought Charles II here more than once, filled the inns with the Court and its hangers-on, and let loose at such times a flood of carelessly spent money. Meanwhile, the posting system was coming into being; and the situation of Burford, eighteen miles from Oxford on one of the great roads to the West—the main road to Gloucester and South Wales—made it the inevitable place for breaking a journey. The rise of the tanning and saddlery trades, in place of the old subsidiary occupations of the wool trade, and still more the rise of malting, are plain indications of the new life of the town.

But the new life had no power to restore the old conditions. Indeed, even if the Burgesses had been minded to challenge at this date the judgement of 1620-1 they would have been ill-advised to make the attempt. The Crown's mistrust of the loyalty of the towns, and the new policy of strengthening the Royal executive, were causing havoc in the sphere of borough liberties. Charters that were of the most ancient authenticity, and valid in law for every item of the jurisdiction exercised under them, had to be fought for, and re-established by fresh grants jealously circumscribed. Short work would certainly have been made of any claim to the erection of liberties on charters against which a court of justice had already pronounced.

Thus the close of the century following upon the highest development of the Corporation of Burford sees it but a shadow of its former self. The Bailiffs, Aldermen, and Burgesses are still, indeed, the heirs of a certain unity and of a title. It is noteworthy, moreover, that most of the gifts of money for charitable purposes (for loans to tradesmen, for apprenticing youths, and so on), which were frequent during the seventeenth century, were made to the Bailiffs and Burgesses as a body. They could still stand in lesser degree for the community; and a Burford man could still feel, in making his will, that his town had an enduring entity to which he could commit his charitable intentions. He could not discern, as we can to-day, the state of constitutional insignificance to which the Corporation had been reduced; nor was the effect of that insignificance, in weakening the Burgesses' self-respect and sense of responsibility, so apparent as it was soon to become.

CHAPTER V

THE DECLINE OF THE CORPORATION, AND ITS LAST STAGES

It is a Corporation sadly changed in character that confronts us when we next obtain a clear view of its activities. Once again we owe this view to a combination of the proceedings of a Royal Commission and a case in the High Court ; and once again the lord of the manor is seen setting the proceedings in motion. On this occasion, however, the ground of the action taken had nothing to do with manorial rights. No functions remained to the Corporation, or had been recovered by them, which could provide a starting-point for a repetition of the controversy with Tanfield. The proceedings of the eighteenth century concerned the town charities alone ; and the Burgesses of the time are revealed to us, not in the comparative dignity of defending, however hopelessly, a claim to burghal privileges, but simply on their trial for mismanagement of trust funds and petty misdemeanours.

The prime mover in the action taken was Mr. John Lenthall;¹ and he seems to have been impelled to the course he took by discovering that a charity fund established by Speaker Lenthall, his grandfather, was in a thoroughly unsatisfactory condition. In 1737 he brought before a vestry meeting a proposal to petition for a Royal Commission to investigate the Burford charities, and it was agreed that petition should be made by the churchwardens and the overseers of the poor.² Lenthall and some others of the principal persons engaged came to an agreement as to the costs of the petition, and the affair was placed in the hands of a solicitor.

The Corporation on its side decided to fight. Various fragments of correspondence surviving among the Burford Records show clearly enough the mood of the Burgesses. They were indignant rather than apprehensive, though they display some anxiety to keep abreast of any steps taken by the other side during the necessary preliminaries. At the same time these letters give us our first revelation of the depths to which the Corporation was falling. To begin with, the Burgesses were not united; two or three of them were on Lenthall's side. Meetings of the two parties were being held in separate inns, each meeting claiming to act as a meeting of the whole Corporation. Then again, so slack had the Burgesses become that they had not at this period either an Alderman or a Steward—an irregularity which permitted either party to call its colloquings a meeting of the Corporation, since one party meeting without proper officers could claim no greater authority than another meeting without officers. The Bailiffs, it is true, were on the side opposed to Lenthall—a curious fact, since it shows how completely these officials had become members of the Corporation, in spite of their formal appointment by the lord of the manor.¹ But the Bailiffs had not, strictly speaking, authority within the Corporation, so that their presence gave no real validity to the meetings they attended.

A Royal Commission was appointed, and sat in 1738. Two copies of its decrees are in the Burford Records, and a transcript in full will be found elsewhere.² The upshot of its proceedings was briefly as follows: it found that the Bailiffs and Burgesses had usurped the sole management of funds in which other persons should have been conjoined with them; that they had mismanaged funds, in some cases having lost money by loans improperly made to members of their own body in an unsound financial position, in others having used money for purposes for which it had not been intended, in others again having omitted to put the money to any uses at all ; that they had allowed charity property to fall into a scandalous state of disrepair, even where provision had specifically been made for the upkeep of the property ; that they had allowed gross neglect at the Grammar School, so that the Master was drawing the whole income without any supervision of expenditure, and was neither doing any work himself nor appointing an usher. Moreover, when the Commission was appointed the Burgesses had done all they could to delay its proceedings and to withhold evidence ; and there was more than a suspicion that they had altered their books before producing them, and had made away with documents.

Upon these findings the Commission based certain Orders. Lost money was to be refunded ; damages were to be paid, in some cases by the Bailiffs and Burgesses as a body, in other cases by individuals for particular default ;¹ the disposition of certain charity rents was altered, a moiety of the rents of Poole's Lands, for instance, being ordered to be paid to the Vicar ; and in almost every case the absolute control of the Bailiffs and Burgesses was to cease, and the charities to be managed either by the Bailiffs and churchwardens or by the Burgesses and churchwardens, the overseers of the poor being included in some instances. Finally, stricter arrangements were to be made for the annual rendering of accounts ; a schedule of all documents in the possession of the Corporation was to be made, to prevent any attempt at suppression in the future ; and a fresh body of Trustees was nominated, much on the lines of the body nominated by the Commission of 1628, with the object of bringing in country gentlemen and others of the neighbourhood likely to modify the exclusively town element.

These Orders were drastic indeed, and on the face of them threatened to put a final end to the ancient Corporation of Burford. If the control of the charity lands departed from it, then everything was gone which could hold it together or give it importance.

That the Burgesses perceived this themselves is clear from the attitude they now assumed, an attitude very different from that in which the Decrees of the Commission of 1628 had been accepted. The Burgesses of that date had made no appeal. The Burgesses of 1738, thus severely condemned, determined to challenge the Commission's Orders, and instituted a suit in the Court of Chancery by petition to the Lord Chancellor—The Bailiffs and Burgesses of Burford, Exceptants v. Lenthall and others, Respondents. Of this suit, as of the Commission, there is very ample information in the Burford Records. Several copies of the Lord Chancellor's judgement are extant, and also—what is far more valuable—two large portions of copies of the pleadings and depositions on either side. The two portions are not in the same handwriting; one would appear to be the copy for the use of the Exceptants, and the other that for the use of the Respondents. But it happens that they supplement one another almost exactly, so that for all practical purposes we have a complete set of the pleadings.¹

The case came on for hearing in 1742. The line taken by the Exceptants may be said to have been in general a denial of the power of the Commission to make the Orders to which exception was being taken, firstly because some of them overrode Decrees of the Commission of 1628; secondly because some of them altered dispositions properly made by various testators in wills duly proved; thirdly because it was ultra vires for the Commission to order restitution of money, and still more so for it to order payment of damages and costs. The main answer of the Respondents was that the Commission had in no case acted beyond its powers; and that the usurpation of control by the Bailiffs and Burgesses was on the evidence so indefensible, and their management of the funds so incompetent, if not fraudulent, that fresh dispositions were very necessary. In one or two matters the Exceptants pleaded that they had been condemned as a body for acts committed by individuals and not corporately. For the rest the pleadings are a mass of flat assertion and counter-assertion. Here and there glimpses are given of the hostility to the lord of the manor which had survived from the days of Tanfield ; one of the objections raised by the Exceptants to the conjoining with them of the churchwardens is that the churchwardens for the town were always ' under the influence of the lord of the manor ', and that to appoint them would be equivalent to giving the lord of the manor a power of interference in purely town affairs.

Judgement was delivered in May 1743. It was a complete triumph on points of law for the Bailiffs and Burgesses. On nearly every issue they raised the Lord Chancellor decided in their favour. Their strong card was evidently the plea that the Royal Commission had no power to vary the Decrees of a previous Royal Commission. This gave them most of their points ; and their plea as to the Commission's power to order the payment of damages and costs gave them other points which had perhaps been particularly disturbing to them. They were, indeed, compelled to make good certain losses of money, though in lesser degree than the Commission had ordered. In their objection to the inclusion of the churchwardens they had their way by pleading the earlier Decrees ; and they also carried their point against the nomination of a fresh body of Trustees. This did not, it is true, technically leave the Burgesses in absolute control ; the previous Decrees had joined with them certain country gentlemen. But, as we have seen, that body had become inanimate ; all detailed control was in the hands of the Burgesses. By carrying their point that under the Decrees of 1628 the only way to appoint new Trustees was by feoffment made by the existing Trustees they secured themselves against any introduction of new members other than such as they agreed to.

been the heart of its corporate existence, and for the past hundred years had constituted its sole common activity. We may remark here how firmly that hold had been re-established against the obvious intentions of the Decrees of 1628. For if we ask ourselves by what right the Bailiffs and Burgesses as such instituted the law-suit of 1742 we can find no sufficient answer in their legal position with regard to the charity property. The Commission had certainly named the Bailiffs and Burgesses in its Orders ; and wherever they were condemned in damages and costs, it was, no doubt, open to them to appeal. But by what right did they contest the Commission's Orders as to the future management of the trusts or the appointment of a new body of Trustees ? If any one had taken action on those points, it should have been the official body of Trustees as appointed by the Commission of 1628. The Bailiffs and Burgesses do not even make the pretence of acting in that name ; they appear throughout in their own title. No clearer evidence could be desired of the completeness with which the Corporation had succeeded in making the charity property a Corporation property, held indeed for the good of the public, but held by them as a Corporation, not as members of a body of Trustees ; and nothing could more clearly show the importance this gave them than the fact that nobody, even in the course of the law-suit, seems to have questioned their right to carry that assumption into the Courts.

It is evident that to them the core of the triumph they won in 1743 was not so much the liberation from the monetary damages as the establishment of their power of control. Some of the surviving copies of the judgement, which seem to have been written out by individual Burgesses in the enthusiasm of victory, contain an index-summary of the charities ; and these indexes reiterate the declaration, ' the management of this charity remains in the Bailiffs and Burgesses ', or some such phrase. The supremacy which the Burgesses had acquired at the end of the sixteenth century by the repurchase of the charity lands, had lost by the Commission of 1628, and had since been regaining by quiet usurpation, was now theirs by a legal judgement. No wonder that, long as the judgement is, they enjoyed writing it out patiently in little books to tell those which should come after.

Apparently it mattered not at all to them that morally, on the charge of misuse of funds and misappropriation of moneys, they made the poorest kind of defence, and that their victory was won almost entirely on technical points of law. It was, perhaps, inevitable that in the minds of Lenthall and those who acted with him the rottenness of the charity administration should have been held to proceed wholly from the unchecked authority of the Bailiffs and Burgesses, so that the one aspect of the question could not be dealt with except by attacking the other. But this had the unfortunate result of causing any attempt at reform to depend upon fresh dispositions of responsibility, which involved conflict with existing Decrees of a Royal Commission. By concentration on that weak spot the Burgesses evaded the moral condemnation.

But it remains on record for any one who peruses the pleadings and depositions. These leave no doubt of the carelessness, incompetence, smug favouritism, and in more than one case the dishonesty, of the management of the charity property. Trust money was lent by the Burgesses to other Burgesses whom they must have known to be in financial difficulties, and no security was taken in spite of specific directions to that end ; appointments of aged widows to the Almshouses depended upon getting into the Burgesses' good graces ; materials to be distributed under charitable bequests were purchased from Burgesses ; the rents of houses were taken and no money spent on repairs, even when repairs had been made a first charge upon the charity. The case of the Grammar School is the worst of all, because it must have been patent to the whole town that the Master was doing no work at all, and that the children were being left untaught and undisciplined.

In fact, the moment at which the Corporation is seen with its remaining hold upon public life more secure than at any previous period in its history is not the height, but the very depth of its existence. It was not appointing its ancient officers ; it was disunited and quarrelsome ; it was composed of petty tradesmen, who held their meetings at various inns, and passed rules which are those of a drinking club rather than a Corporation.¹

Yet the Burgesses had not wholly lost the memory of their former status as a borough. There are signs that shortly before the date of the Royal Commission of 1738 they contemplated a movement to recover the privileges which the sixteenth-century Burgesses had exercised. Among the Burford Records is an Indenture of Agreement made in 1728 between the Bailiffs of the year, the Alderman, the Chamberlain, and six of the Burgesses, of the one part, and Richard Griffiths of the other part. It sets forth that the lords of the manor had ' by pretence of a judgement in the Court of Exchequer seized upon the profits of the markets ' ; that this judgement had been obtained only against certain Bailiffs and Burgesses in their private capacity ; that no execution was ever taken, and the franchises had not been seized into the King's hands, but the lord of the manor had used the judgement in order to possess himself of the franchises by intimidating the Burgesses. In these circumstances the Bailiffs had been advised to sue out a writ of error to reverse the judgement. For this purpose the rents of Poole's Lands, given to be used for the confirmation of charters and other objects in furtherance of the well-being of the Corporation, might properly be employed. But as these rents amounted only to £25 a year, the present Indenture of Agreement was made, to the effect that Richard Griffiths was to receive this sum of £25 a year on trust, and if necessary a capital sum of £10 apiece from each of the other parties to the agreement, in order to set proceedings on foot ; and meanwhile an effort was to be made to mortgage Poole's Lands, with the intent of raising the sum required for carrying on the proceedings.²

Plainly to be taken in conjunction with this Agreement are two small pieces of paper containing notes on the franchises anciently exercised ; these fragments are dated 1727.

Now the Agreement was based on a thorough misapprehension of the situation. The Burgesses could never comprehend that the association of the town of Burford with the Crown was not the proper constitutional relation of a borough held at fee-farm and thereby authorized to elect its chief officers and manage its own affairs, but the merely accidental relation arising from the passage of the manor into the hands of the Crown. Consequently, they had never grasped the fact that when the Crown disposed of the town and manor to a purchaser, it disposed also of all the privileges which went with the town. The lord of the manor was in enjoyment of the profits of the markets, not by pretence of the judgement, but by simple purchase; the judgement only corrected the mistake which the original purchaser had made in not assuring himself that the vendor was in effective possession of the property sold. Whether it is true or not that the judgement had never been put in execution, we have no means of knowing. That process would in any case have been a mere formality, and such a lawyer as Tanfield is not likely to have omitted it. The probability is that the Burgesses were misled by the phrase 'seized into the hands of the Crown'. Seeing that the privileges were not, in point of fact, in the hands of the Crown, they very likely assumed that the judgement had not been carried into execution. They did not realize that already the privileges had been sold by the Crown to another holder, so that execution would not bring the Crown back into possession of the town, but would only secure the title of Tanfield.

Even apart from this fundamental misapprehension the movement cannot be taken seriously. Richard Griffiths, who was chosen to be the repository of the funds, was the school-master who was ten years later to be exposed as having converted to his own use the whole income of the school, while performing none of the duties. His position in that matter was so bad that he avoided appearing before the Commission, and 'did privately withdraw himself from Burford and conceal himself in London until after the Return or Close of the said Commission'.¹ Before the suit of 1742 was brought he seems to have become feeble-minded. If he was to occupy a position of responsibility in the attempt to recover the borough privileges, the proposal cannot have been launched with much wisdom. It was probably little more than a piece of pot-house pompousness, set on foot by one of the infrequenting groups of Burgesses.

At any rate it went no further. For one thing, the attack made by Lenthall and his associates gave the Burgesses enough to think about, and certainly enough opportunity to spend what money they had at their disposal, in defending their position without attempting to improve it. When that trouble was safely over, they probably felt that their new security in control of the charities sufficed for their sense of their own importance. No other movement was ever made for more exalted functions.

With this incident, therefore, the history of the Corporation of Burford comes, in one sense, to an end. But the body of the Bailiffs and Burgesses still survived, and the record of its existence must be carried further, though it can be hardly more than a record of increasing decay.

In another hundred years (with such regularity did the Corporation fall into sloughs of mismanagement) a public inquiry had again become necessary. A Report of the Charity Commissioners of 1822 reveals the Burgesses to us yet once more neglecting their property, losing the rents, and allowing some of their own members to misuse trust property for their private profit.

As one after another the charities come under review the report of the Commissioners is almost monotonously the same. With few exceptions the houses were in disrepair—one was actually a mere heap of rubbish—and the rents heavily in arrear. From 1805 to 1814 the office of clerk to the feoffees was held in conjunction with the office of treasurer to the Corporation, by one Waters. 'During that period no account was ever delivered by him to the feoffees; and upon his death no papers were found from which any account could be made out'; or, as another reference puts it, 'he died suddenly in 1814, having made no entry whatever of any receipts or disbursements during the whole of the time he held that situation.'

In several instances the Lord Chancellor's judgement of 1743 had been evaded. While relieving the Bailiffs and Burgesses of the heaviest parts of the payments ordered by the Commission, the judgement did direct the refunding of certain sums of money. These, it was found, had never been refunded.

Five years later the muddle, into which the Burgesses had allowed their business to fall, came to a head in a manner almost ludicrous, though in the end it was to the good of the charity property that the situation which arose in 1827 was so extreme as to require the intervention of the law.¹ Among the laxities to which the Commission of 1822 had drawn attention (but in vain) was this: that the body of Feoffees, or Trustees, which by the constitution of the Trusts should never have sunk below six in number without the making of a new feoffment appointing fresh members, had actually dwindled to one old man, the Hon. and Rev. Francis Knollis, Vicar of Burford. In 1826 he died, and died intestate, without having appointed any new Trustees. Apparently no attempt had been made to get him to appoint any, until about a year before his death, and he was by that time too feeble and too forgetful to carry the matter through.

The position, then, was this extraordinary one: the whole of the charity property, Mr. Francis Knollis having been the sole surviving feoffee, had passed by his intestacy to his heir-at-law, the Rev. James Knollis, Vicar of Penn, Buckinghamshire; and no one could tell what now became of the title to the ownership of the property. Mr. James Knollis could hardly treat the charity lands as his private possession; but on the other hand the tenants might refuse to pay rent at all, since he was certainly not a feoffee under the constitution of the charities. Fortunately for the town he was a straightforward man, and his one desire was to rid himself of the embarrassment by handing over the property to a new body of Trustees. Had it been otherwise, long and costly processes of law might have been necessary to recover the title. But, even with all his willingness, the matter was not so simple as it looked. The constitution of the trusts made no provision for the appointment of new Trustees by the heir of a surviving feoffee—naturally enough, since every care had been taken, as far as direct instructions could go, that the matter should never come to such a pass.

Had the difficulty arisen a few years earlier, there could have been no course except to lay an information before the Attorney-General, and move him to proceed—a most expensive business. But an Act of Parliament had recently been passed, under which it was possible to rectify the situation by petition to the Master of the Rolls. This was done; a draft list of new feoffees was by his order submitted to one of the Masters in Chancery, and from him authority was obtained for the transfer of the property to them.

In the correspondence concerning the difficulty there are many proofs of the carelessness still vitiating the management of the charities. In a statement of the case to be submitted to counsel it is remarked that 'a leading member of the Corporation', one Tuckwell, was tenant of a large part of the charity property, and was at this time at least seven years in arrear with the rents, owing some £400. All the other tenants were more or less in arrear. It was known, too, that the defaulters, 'especially Tuckwell', were watching for any legal flaw in the transfer, to take advantage of it in order to escape payment of their arrears.

The whole affair was very much in the spirit of the preceding century. With the rents so heavily in arrear every duty of the Corporation in regard to the charities must have been neglected, the property ruinous, the school inefficient, the poor unrelieved. Tradition was even maintained to the point of finding one of the chief defaulters a member of the Corporation.

For the brief remainder of its career the Burford Corporation has next to no history, but what there is is decent. Public opinion was beginning to improve, and the Municipal Corporations Act of 1835 is a sign of the dawning conviction that the national life was getting no good from small unrepresentative bodies ranking as Corporations.

It is, of course, unlikely that so slack and incompetent a management of business as was revealed by the Commissioners' Report of 1822 would be other than a reflexion of the managing body. The Corporation which in 1738 had rendered an inquiry necessary was disunited, petty in outlook, poor in self-respect. The Corporation of 1822 was practically moribund. The Commissioners record that, though there was an Alderman again, there was no Steward, and there were only three Burgesses; no meeting had then been held for six or seven years.

It never really revived. The management of the charities, after the absurd muddle of 1826-7, was firmly vested in a proper body of Trustees, and the Corporation was at last in the subordinate place to which the Commission of 1628 had unsuccessfully attempted to reduce it. For a quarter of a century yet the title of the Bailiffs, Alderman, and Burgesses of Burford remained to represent one of those wizened little survivals which so curiously took rank as Corporations alike with the vigorous ancient bodies that had early been subjected to the healthy discipline of public responsibility, and with the great modern Town Councils, which were the expression of a new element in the nation's history—the huge industrial concentrations of population.

The end of the Burford Corporation came in 1861. Even the manner of its abolition has some of that accidental quality which had marked its whole career. The Act of Parliament which extinguished it is not an Act primarily concerning the Corporation, or identified with its name. The ancient title, with nearly eight hundred years of history behind it, does not appear on the index of the Public Statutes. In 1861 was passed 'An Act for confirming a Scheme of the Charity Commissioners for certain Charities in the Town and Parish of Burford in the County of Oxford'. In a single clause the Act confirms the Scheme 'as the same is set out in the Schedule to this Act'. Of this Schedule the first sentence is: 'The existing Corporation of the alderman, steward, bailiffs, and burgesses of the Borough of Burford is hereby dissolved.'

Surely the depth of insignificance—to be abolished by a Schedule.

PART II

STUDIES IN THE HISTORY OF BURFORD

CHAPTER VI

THE LORDSHIP OF THE MANOR AND TOWN OF BURFORD

THE history of the lordship of the manor and town of Burford is to be seen at large in the list of those who held it. Little in the shape of personal detail need be added to the bare list, for the names entered there over a period of six hundred years have their places in the history of England.

Robert of Gloucester, Queen Matilda's champion against Stephen; John, King of England; the De Clares—always among the leaders of the feudal barons, whether in the days of that Gilbert de Clare who was one of the barons of the Great Charter, the later Gilbert, 'the Red', who was with Simon de Montfort in the Provisions of Oxford, or the last Gilbert who fell at Bannockburn; the Despensers, from Hugh the King's favourite to Thomas, shamefully beheaded by Henry IV; Henry Beauchamp, the friend and companion of the young Henry VI; Warwick the King-maker; and then, at a later period, following upon a long tenure of the manor by the Crown, Fortescue, Tanfield, Lucius Lord Falkland, and William Lenthall—names such as these require no comment here.

All that need perhaps be said is that for the first time an attempt has been made to trace the entire descent of the lordship, leaving no step in the succession unaccounted for; and also to give documentary authority, not merely for the tenure by each individual of territories known to have included Burford, but for his actual tenure of Burford itself. This authority is lacking in only one instance in the ensuing list. The most interesting addition to the known lords of Burford is certainly Robert of Gloucester. This was due to recognizing as granted by him a charter occupying an obscure place on the Burford Gild Certificate. Owing to its brevity and omission of specific grant of liberties it was placed by the Burgesses, who made the Certificate, out of its due order. But the style with which it opens is the unique style of Robert of Gloucester, so that the document is unimpeachable evidence of his lordship; curt and abrupt, reduced to the smallest possible limits in phrasing, it may well be characteristic of the man. It is interesting also to have established King John's tenure of Burford; and on the lesser plane of picturesque associations to have inserted the names of Edward, son of the Duke of Clarence, executed on charges of complicity with Perkin Warbeck, and of that skilful but unpleasant personage, John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland.

It is, of course, to its connexion with the territories of one of the greatest of feudal Honours that Burford owes the remarkably distinguished list of its lords. The Honour of Gloucester was the chief item in the lands granted to Fitz-Hamon by William Rufus; and the history of Burford shows that the former possessions of the Bishop of Bayeux in this extreme western portion of Oxfordshire were attached by FitzHamon, no doubt as a measure of administrative convenience, to his Gloucester territories, to which, indeed, in spite of county divisions, they have natural affinity. It would appear, also, that in some subdivision of the territories Burford, together with Fairford and one or two other places, was grouped with Tewkesbury at an early date. Certain writs of King John concerning the place are addressed, not to the Sheriff of Oxfordshire, but to William de La Faleise, who was Keeper of the manor of Tewkesbury; and in an early account of escheats (1232-3), when the Honour was held by the Crown as guardian during the minority of Richard de Clare, the revenues of the manor of Burford are definitely allotted in the main 'ad partem de Theokbiri'.

Thus Tewkesbury may be regarded as, in some sense, a mother-place to Burford ; and with more than slight stirrings of loyalty the Burford man may stand in the great Abbey Church there, beholding the tombs of those to whom his predecessors owed allegiance. He may turn his eyes to the beautiful little chantry on the north side of the chancel, where were laid, ' wrapped in fine diaper ', the bones of him who first gave Burford men their liberties and their Gild ; and he may see, wrought upon the tiles in the floor of the chantry, the rampant lion which from that day to this Burford has borne as arms. Beneath the chancel floor the dust of the de Clares is mingled with the dust of royalty. Close by the chantry of FitzHamon, Hugh le Despenser, son of Edward II's favourite, lies at his mailed length ; and opposite him, on the south side of the chancel, Edward le Despenser kneels in the shadows on the roof of his chantry, facing towards the altar in his age-long prayer.

Splendid as is the roll of the Burford lords, it has not on that account been the easier to trace and establish in detail. A princely territory like the Honour of Gloucester is not likely to show the placid succession of lords through long periods that minor possessions enjoyed. Its holders were always, from the nature of the case, men so near to the throne and the Blood Royal that in disturbed times their lands were constantly being forfeited, and regranted by the Crown.

The first difficulty of this kind, though but a slight one, is the uncertainty about the date at which King John actually entered the lordship. When he married Isabella, one of the daughters and co-heirs of William, Earl of Gloucester, he was already in possession of such vast territories that Henry II appears to have hesitated about allowing the Gloucester lordship also to pass into his hands. But at any rate some part of it, including Burford, had been recognized as his by the time of Richard's accession.

Thereafter, for some two hundred years, the position of the manor of Burford is clear enough. It followed in turn each of the lines of descent through Earl William's three daughters. King John, after his divorce from Isabella, granted it to Amaury, Count of Evreux, who was the son of Mabel, the eldest daughter, and after his death to William de Cantilupe, who married his widow. From him (if he ever actually held it, for the grant to him is curiously worded) the manor of Burford passed, with other Gloucester territories, to the de Clares, in virtue of Richard de Clare's marriage to Amice, the other daughter of Earl William.

In their hands Burford remained until the death of the last Gilbert de Clare at Bannockburn in 1314. He left three sisters, all of whom were married, Eleanor to Hugh le Despenser, Margaret to Piers Gaveston, and Elizabeth to John de Burgh. After Gilbert's death these three men seem to have made a division of his estates among themselves. Appended to the Inquisition Post Mortem (Edward II, File 42) is a sheaf of writs to the Sheriffs of various counties, bidding them eject these three from castles and lordships of which they had taken possession. They had not waited to see whether a posthumous heir might be born. The Sheriffs' returns to these writs display no little helplessness; they virtually confess themselves unable to carry out the evictions. We may conclude, in the case of Burford at any rate, that they ultimately succeeded, from the evidence of the Lay Subsidy of 1316, which places at the head of the list for Burford the name of Isabella de Clare, Gilbert's aunt; her possession of the place, on a grant by her brother, Gilbert the Red, must have been restored. Moreover, we have the evidence of the formal grant to Hugh le Despenser and his wife in 1322 as proof that they had not, previously been in possession.

The death of Thomas le Despenser in 1399 brings us to the next uncertainty. By his attainder his lands must have been forfeited. The fact that a lease of the site and agricultural lands of the manor to a tenant was made in 1428 by the Crown, and that an account of escheats of 1435-6 speaks of Burford as having been held by Thomas, last Lord le Despenser, on the day of his death, without any mention of a subsequent holder of the manor, can hardly mean anything except that Burford was for all this time in the hands of the Crown. Yet it must soon after this have been restored to the Despenser heirs, because Isabel, the daughter of Thomas le Despenser, who brought the Gloucester territory by marriage to the Beauchamps and then to the Nevilles, appears as seized of the manor of Burford in 1439.

The fate of Burford at the next escheat of the territory, after the death of the King-maker, is clear enough, and is set out in the list which follows. But another period of some uncertainty occurs in the middle of the sixteenth century. Upon an exchange of lands between Edward VI and John Dudley, Earl of Warwick, in 1549, the latter acquired, perhaps in order to give colour to his title, then still new, the old 'Warwick's lands' in Burford. Yet in 1552 the town and manor were again in the hands of Edward VI, there having been another exchange.¹ A further complication is introduced later by references in the Burford Corporation Books to Sir Edward Unton as holding courts of the manor, and by a statement in one of the Priory Deeds of Sale that he held the manor in right of his wife Anne, Countess of Warwick, for term of her life. This Countess of Warwick was the widow of the Duke of Northumberland's son, who died so soon after his release from the Tower, on his pardon for complicity in the Lady Jane Grey plot. Either there must have been yet another exchange, subsequent to 1552, or the manor, as once having been held by John Dudley, was granted for the maintenance of his son's widow.

Nor is it only the exalted station of the lords of Burford which produces obscurities in the history of the manor. Another cause, almost equally fruitful of difficulty, is the division that was created by the erection of a chartered community within the manor. There is, indeed, nothing in the charters themselves to create division. They bestow liberties upon 'the men of Burford' in general; and no document of an early date suggests that the term 'Burford' was of limited application in regard to the whole feudal unit. Yet by the end of the thirteenth century the manor clearly comprises three members, the Burgus of Burford, and the hamlets of Signett and Upton. The question of how this partition came about may be more conveniently discussed in a later Chapter on the Topography of Burford. For our present purpose it is enough to point out that the manor had become thus divided. Consequently it is necessary to establish very carefully the exact holding of any person mentioned in connexion with the tenure of the manor. When the division first appears in our Records there is no uncertainty. A tenant, John Giffard, held by sub-infeudation, at a service of one knight's fee, £20 of rent of the town of Burford to himself and his heirs, with the rest of the town for his life only, and the hamlet of Signett, which was outside the burghal system. The chief lord retained only the hamlet of Upton, also outside the burghal system, and the remaining value of the town above £20 of rent after the lifetime of John Giffard. But even this does not exhaust the subdivisions, for the family of de Fanencourt held some portion of the town by service of half a knight's fee.

Without a clear understanding of these circumstances the history of the manor in Edward II's reign would be very puzzling; for the simultaneous holdings of Hugh le Despenser and Isabella de Clare would be inexplicable. But in the light of the Inquisitions of 1295 and 1299 they can be reduced to order. Gilbert the Red, ninth Earl, it appears from the Patent Roll of 1 Edward III (pt. I, m. 13), had given the manor of Burford to his sister Isabella. Now in view of the sub-infeudation to John Giffard this can only mean that he gave her the hamlet of Upton; and this is also proved by the Inquisition Post Mortem of the last Gilbert de Clare (1314), in which he appears as holding only that portion of the town's value which had reverted to the chief lord on the death of John Giffard the elder, and not (as his father had done) the hamlet of Upton. Isabella married Maurice de Berkeley, whose estates were forfeited on the accession of Edward III; but his wife received a special regrant of 'the manor of Burford without the town', on the ground that she had always held this land herself by her brother's grant, and had not enfeoffed any other person. Hugh le Despenser's holding had come about by another and earlier forfeiture, the estates of John Giffard the younger being escheated. This brought the town of Burford into the hands of the Crown ; and Eleanor, Hugh le Despenser's wife, being already, as one of the co-heirs of the last Gilbert de Clare, in possession of that part of the town's value above John Giffard's £20 of rent, the whole was combined in the grant to le Despenser.

Possibilities of confusion in the earlier centuries are much increased by the use of the name ' Burford ' to describe sometimes the complete feudal unit including the town, sometimes the town alone, and sometimes the agricultural portion alone. Thus, although the land held at farm by Robert Atkyns in 1428 was entirely in the hamlets of Signett and Upton, it is described as the manor of Burford. Hence, too, the mistake that has been made in supposing that Edmund Harman, some hundred years later, obtained the lordship of the manor. He only obtained the agricultural portion for a term of years, the lordship remaining in the Crown.

This kind of confusion disappears about the middle of the sixteenth century, when the burghal and the agricultural portion received different names. In the Edwardian Survey the latter is entered as ' the manor of Bury Barns ' ; and thereafter the name of ' Burford ' belongs distinctively to the town.

But by that time we approach the end of obscurities from another direction. The Letters Patent by which Queen Elizabeth disposed of the manor and town to Sir John Fortescue, her Chancellor of the Exchequer and Sub-Treasurer, leave some remnant of the old duality in clauses reserving certain leases of the Bury Barns land. But when Sir Lawrence Tanfield acquired the property from Fortescue's heirs, he seems to have extinguished, by purchase, this divided tenure, and from henceforth the whole of the manor and town passes as a single manorial property. So it remained until William John Lenthall, under the load of mortgage incumbrance that had accumulated by 1820, broke it up by selling the farm of Bury Barns and some other pieces of the estate to various purchasers, before he finally sold the Priory and the Manor to Charles Greenaway of Barrington Grove, in 1828.

Mr. Charles Greenaway, who was M.P. for Leominster, married Charlotte Sophia, daughter of Mr. Robert Hurst, of Horsham Park, Sussex, but had no children. He had, however, a niece, the daughter of his sister Mary, who had married Mr. Edward Youde of Plas Madoc, Denbigh. Mr. Greenaway died in 1859, and the estate was for some time in Chancery. Mrs. Greenaway died in 1875, and the niece, Miss Mary Jane Youde, succeeded to the property. With her death, in 1892, the Greenaway line came to an end, and the property and lordship of the manor passed to Mrs. Greenaway's family—the Hursts of Horsham Park—with whom the lordship of the manor now remains.

1387 Hugh, Earl of Stafford	—	P. R. O. Min. Accts. 957.10. This account, of the year 1435/6, refers to the town and manor as having been held by Thomas, last Lord Despenser, at the time of his death, but makes no reference to any other holder since then. Evidently, therefore, Burford had not passed with the other Despenser lands to the son and daughter of Thomas le Despenser.

Lords of the Manor and Town of Burford.	Tenants of the Manor.	Notes and Authorities.
		Countess of Warwick, was the daughter of Thomas le Despenser. Apparently the manor of Burford had been restored to her as heiress of the Despenser lands.
1439 Henry Bea- champ, Duke of Warwick	—	P. R. O. Inq. P. M. 24 Hen. VI, no. 43. He succeeded to his mother's estates, and Burford is entered among his possessions on the Inquisition.
1446 Lady Anne, daughter of the preceding	—	Cal. Pat. Rolls, Hen. VI, 1441-1446, p. 434. John Norreys, King's Esquire of the Body, was appointed Steward of the Despenser lands, during the minority of the Duke's heir.
1449 Richard Neville, Earl of War- wick, 'The King-maker'	—	By his marriage with the Lady Anne Beauchamp, sister of the Duke of Warwick, he succeeded to the estates on the death of the Duke's daughter. His possession of Burford is proved by two documents, in the Burford Records, bundle GG, nos. A1 and A4, the date of the latter being 1456, and that of the former between 1461 and 1471.
	1460 Humfrey, Duke of Buck- ingham	Cal. Inq. P. M., vol. iv, p. 290. Held half a knight's fee as heir of W. de Fanencourt.
(1471 The Crown)		After the death of the King-maker his estates were escheated to the Crown, and Edward IV divided them between his brothers, the Duke of Clarence and Richard, Duke of Gloucester (afterwards Richard III), who had married the two daughters of the King-maker. The Tewkesbury lands fell to the Duke of Clarence, and it is clear from the succeeding entries that Burford thus came into his hands,

The regnal year of Harman's lease is not filled in, but it must have been before 1549, since the lease was granted by the Crown, and in 1549 the manor of Burford passed out of the Crown's hands for some years. But it cannot have been earlier than 1547, since the date of the lease gives the reign as of Edward VI.

CHAPTER VII

OFFICERS OF THE TOWN, THE GILD, AND THE CORPORATION

THE first mention of Bailiffs of Burford occurs in 1263 in a conveyance preserved among the muniments of Brasenose College, Oxford. But in that instance the officers are not named. The earliest mention of a Bailiff by name is of the year 1285, and is found in a document preserved at the Public Record Office. Various documents among the Burford Records give the names of Bailiffs at intervals during the fifteenth century. No systematic record of them was kept until the sixteenth century, when a complete list of the Bailiffs from 1509 to 1587 was entered in one of the Memorandum Books of the Corporation. From that date until 1651 we have to depend again upon occasional entries in Account Books, leases of the Charity Lands, &c. After 1651 another systematic list becomes available.

From these various sources the following list has been compiled :

From the year 1846 William Ackerman held office alone as Bailiff until the Corporation was dissolved.

No mention can be found of any member of the Corporation described as 'Alderman' before 1530. Yet it is difficult to imagine that neither the Gild nor the Corporation had a Chief Officer; and therefore, as occasional references are found to Burgesses described as 'Seniors', it has been assumed that they may be included in the following list of the Chief Officers. No systematic list of the holders of the Aldermanship was ever kept; and the only possible list is a fragmentary one, made up from various references in the Burford Records.

The earliest mention of an official with the title of Steward is of the year 1537. But in the case of this office there is less difficulty in recognizing it under earlier names. The 'Seneschal' mentioned occasionally during the fifteenth century was certainly the officer later called the Steward. It also seems certain that occasional references both of early and of late periods to a 'Chamberlain' indicate the same officer. Again, we have no systematic record of the holders of the post, and can only compile a fragmentary list.

CHAPTER VIII

THE CHURCH OF ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST, BURFORD

By the Rev. William C. Emeris, Vicar of Burford

WITH SOME HISTORICAL NOTES ON CHURCH AFFAIRS IN BURFORD

By R. H. Gretton

A CHURCH must have existed in Burford from early times ; but of an Anglo-Saxon or early Norman structure nothing now remains, unless a fragment is to be seen in the doorway, within the church, leading to the tower steps.

The outline of the history of the present building would seem to be as follows :

(i) A church, consisting of nave, tower, and short chancel, was built towards the close of the twelfth century. Of this building there remain the west wall and west door, and the tower. One other small fragment may be seen, built into the north wall of the Tanfield chapel ; and in the room over the porch there are two stones, which have formed part of a Norman doorway, perhaps the south door of the original church.

(ii) In the thirteenth century the chancel was lengthened, arches were opened in the north and south walls of the tower, and the transepts were built. A south aisle must also have been erected.

(iii) A hundred years later the chapel of St. Thomas of Canterbury was built west of the south transept, with a crypt beneath. The font is of this period.

(iv) Towards the close of the fourteenth century a great work of reconstruction began. It may be said that for a hundred and twenty years work of building or decoration was going on in the church ; and at the close of this period the church had reached the size and shape which we now see. A sacristy was built to the north of the sanctuary, in which the original altar still remains, a new nave with north and south aisles was erected, the tower was raised and a spire added,¹ and the beautiful porch arose. Then, however, the Norman tower showed signs of weakness under the additional weight that had been put upon it. In order to save it, reinforcing work had to be done, the nature of which is perfectly evident to-day. The north and south arches opening from the tower space into the transepts were partially filled up, lower and narrower arches appearing under the original ones; the north transept was shortened and strengthened with thrusts and buttresses, and the north wall of the chancel was widened and so arranged as to form a support; several of the small arches within the tower above the main arches were blocked up. The slightly distorted curve of these main arches, and certain signs of old cracks in the walls above, remain to show what danger the tower had been in. At about the same time as this building was taking place, the north wall of the north transept was prolonged eastwards to form a chapel north of the chancel. Later a south chancel chapel was built, and a new east window inserted in the chancel.

(v) There remains to mention one other feature of the church, which was not from the first an integral part of the structure. In the thirteenth century the Gild Merchant of Burford built a chapel, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin Mary, in the churchyard, close to the south-west corner of the church, but detached from it. The separate position of the chapel is evident in one document of the Burford Records, a conveyance of property by one William More, of Henley-on-Thames, to Thomas Spicer, with certain remainders to the church of Burford. Remainder to the Gild chapel is also included, and it is described as 'capella beate marie in eodem cimeterio que est burgi'. This specific description of the chapel as 'in the churchyard' proves that it was not at that date (1422) a part of the church. In the fifteenth century this chapel was lengthened towards the east, so as to reach the great south porch; it was shortened at the west end, and was opened to the south aisle by an arcade. On its enlargement, it was re-dedicated as the great chapel of St. Mary and St. Anne. As it stands the chapel bears signs of its two distinct stages of existence. The south door, now blocked, with a defaced crucifix above it, and the windows and door, also now blocked, in the north wall, are relics of the original Gild chapel. It is just possible that the remains of the window to be seen at the junction of the north wall with the west wall of the main building, at a lower level and of somewhat later date than the other windows in the north wall, may mark for us, if it was a kind of low side window, the position of the altar in the original chapel.

The extension of the chapel into the church fabric coincides interestingly with the period at which the Gild of Burford was rising to importance, and was assuming authority over various church funds.

It is interesting also in another way, because the detached position of the first chapel has produced a curious irregularity in the ground plan of the church. The two buildings were not oriented on quite parallel axes, with the result that the Gild chapel, when lengthened eastwards, entered the main building at a distinct slant.

Of the original arrangements within the church and of the decoration which adorned it some idea can be formed from hints which the present building supplies, and from documents which have survived.

We see the blocked doorway which led out upon the rood loft, and this marks the position of the great rood at the western tower arch, and doubtless of some form of screen beneath it. There are unmistakeable traces of another screen under the eastern tower arch.

Probably the altar in St. Peter's chapel was connected with the rood screen. The present dedication is modern. Of the general structure of this chapel, which is such an unusual and interesting feature of the church, it is impossible to speak with certainty. The stone canopy must undoubtedly have belonged to a mediaeval altar; but the woodwork, according to the accepted view, was erected by Sir Lawrence Tanfield to form a priory pew, a use which the canopied enclosure served for some two centuries. In support of this view it is pointed out that the woodwork does not fit on properly to the stone canopy, and conceals some remains of decoration on the upper face of the stonework. However, the most recent authoritative opinion regards the wooden canopy as also part of the original chapel, though of later date than the stone canopy.

The screens dividing the north and south chancel chapels from the chancel are original; but that dividing the Tanfield chapel from the north transept is a medley of mediaeval and Jacobean work; it was placed there by Lady Tanfield. The screen of St. Thomas's chapel is mainly original, and still preserves much of its colouring. About the beginning of the eighteenth century this chapel was reserved for the attendance of members of the Corporation at divine service, and called the Burgesses' Aisle; portions of the screen have been cut out, apparently for their convenience, and fresh pieces have had to be inserted.

The pulpit also is original mediaeval work, but in this case the colour has been revived.

Of the colour decoration of the walls traces are to be found in the south transept and in St. Thomas's chapel, and in the Tanfield chapel there is a very interesting recess in which the decoration still lingers. Patches of colour on the stonework in the nave suggest how much was lost through the disastrous removal of the plaster in early stages of the nineteenth-century restoration; and it is on record that there was a figure of St. Christopher on the wall near the pulpit.¹

Of other features of the mediaeval church, evidence is provided by the will of Henry Bisshope, dated October 28, 1478, which is among the Burford Records. In this document a chapel of St. Katherine is specially mentioned, perhaps the chapel in which the Tanfield monument stands; the matrix of a brass which may have been Henry Bisshope's is in this chapel. He bequeathed one pair of vestments for celebrating Mass particularly at the altar of that chapel.

But what we chiefly owe to his will is a knowledge of the altar lights anciently in the church. He left bequests for the maintenance of many of them, naming those of the Holy Cross, the Holy Trinity, St. Katherine, St. Mary and St. Anne in 'the chapel', St. John, St. Stephen, St. Clement, St. Thomas, the light called Sidelight, the light called Torchlight, and the light of All Souls. The situation of some of these can, of course, be identified.

Five years earlier John Pynnok, senior, had made bequests to the high altar, and for the repair of that altar and every other altar in the church; but unfortunately he does not say how many these were, nor give their dedications.

Of ancient glass such fragments as survive are to be seen in the upper lights of the east and west windows, and in the north window of the north transept.¹

Some few pieces in the west window are in situ. The figures and angels would seem to have come from tracery lights. Among the figures the following saints have been identified: the Blessed Virgin Mary, St. Barbara, St. Margaret, St. Mary Magdalen, a female saint holding a book in her left hand, perhaps St. Katherine, and St. George piercing the dragon with a spear held in both hands, and wearing armour of circa 1480. It would appear that the angels belonged to a series representing the Nine Orders; they may have been in the clerestory windows in the nave, and the female saints in the windows of the Lady Chapel. Of a set of symbols of the Evangelists, that of St. Luke is in the west window and that of St. Matthew in the east. Some small letters of an inscription in the west window read 'How a manne ma wedde', and suggest that there was also a series representing the Seven Sacraments. Other fragments give interesting types of canopies, and parts of a figure of an archbishop, fully vested, with the pallium, perhaps St. Thomas of Canterbury.

In the east window there are rounds with the Jesus and the Mary monograms, in situ. We see also St. Christopher, and two angels of the Annunciation. At the top of one light is a head of fourteenth-century character, but all the other fragments are of fifteenth-century glass. However, in the cusped head of one of the central lights there is the merchant's mark of some donor (inverted), and it corresponds exactly with the mark used by Simon Wisdom on his seal. As is remarked elsewhere, there is no evidence of any one of this name, or of the name of Wisdom at all, in any of the Burford Records, before the well-known Simon Wisdom, who figures so largely in the town's history. As he was living till about 1582 or 1583, he can hardly have been concerned in the erection of fifteenth-century windows; and this fragment must almost certainly have come from some later window given by him.

The collection and placing of the fragments in the east and west windows was done in 1826.¹ When the lower lights of the west window were filled with modern glass in 1874 one head under a canopy was removed, and this is now in the north window of the north transept; it represents St. James of Compostella, with a cockle shell on his hat. Other fragments found in the church have been placed in the centre of this window. The piece bearing the arms of St. Edward the Confessor and the glass in the tracery lights were given to the church in 1911.

Of the monuments in the church, the oldest, and the only one which preserves the memory of a mediaeval citizen of Burford, is the beautiful bracket brass beneath the rood, from which John Spicer, with his wife Alys, still speaks to us.² He died in 1437, and the rood beneath which his body was laid had been his gift to the church, together with one of the windows :

The wiche rode soler in this chirche
 Upon my cost I dede do wirche
 Wt a lamp birnyng bright
 To worschip god both day & nyght
 And a gabul wyndow dede do make
 In helth of soule and for Crist sake.

² During the work on the church in 1826-7 this brass was discovered a foot below the flooring of that time; this, no doubt, accounts for its preservation.

This window we can perhaps identify by connecting it with the question of the dedication of St. Thomas's chapel, which is of particular interest, because St. Thomas of Canterbury is not a saint usually commemorated in the churches of this part of England. It would seem likely that the chapel was given by some one who had a peculiar attachment to the saint. Now the document concerning Thomas Spicer, which has already been referred to in connexion with the Lady Chapel, makes very special provision for the upkeep of 'the light which is before the altar of the said Thomas Spycer in the parish church'; that light is to take precedence of every other purpose in the ultimate disposal of his money. In view of this fact, and in view also of the curiously personal description of the altar, it is evident that 'the altar of Thomas Spycer' was in some rather unusual way connected with his name. Thus it is at least permissible to conjecture that he may have built the chapel of St. Thomas of Canterbury as to his name-saint. If so, perhaps John Spicer's gable window is the one in this chapel, and is his contribution to his relative's work.

Another mediaeval citizen, and obviously a greater than John Spicer, has left the fine decorated altar-tomb in the south transept. The tomb originally bore another bracket brass, of exactly the same type as John Spicer's, with the two figures kneeling at the foot of an elevated bracket; but every scrap of metal has now disappeared, except one small fragment of the inscription round the edge, bearing the name 'Willelmus'. We are not, however, without other clues. Sir Richard Lee, the Herald, who visited and made notes in so many of the churches of Oxfordshire in 1574,¹ records 'a fair tomb of marble', which must almost certainly have been this one, since we have knowledge of no other tomb in the church at that date to which the description would apply. It was even then 'defaced', but it had not been completely stripped, for Lee records three coats of arms upon it.² From the fact that he gives the tinctures, it would seem probable that these coats were not in the now empty matrices of shields on the top of the tomb (for arms in brass were seldom, if ever, tinctured), but were on some of the shields held by angels round the body of the tomb. The arms recorded were: (1) Gules a lion rampant guardant or, impaling a merchant's mark; (2) argent three stumps of trees coupé and eradicated sable, impaling argent a maunch sable; (3) quarterly first and fourth argent three stumps of trees coupé and eradicated sable, second and third argent a maunch sable.

Unfortunately these clues, taken in conjunction with such indication of date as the style of the tomb affords, do not suffice to identify the person buried beneath. The character of the brass, as seen from the matrices, together with the general style of the tomb, would date it somewhere between 1370 and 1450. The first of the three coats of arms given above is proof that the man commemorated was a Burford merchant. The impaling and quartering of the Hastings device (the maunch) shows that one of this family married one of the Hastings family. But the link which the other device might be expected to supply is missing. The tree stumps cannot be connected with any Burford family. But for the shield bearing the Burford lion and the merchant's mark we should, indeed, hardly have looked among Burford men for the person here commemorated. Not only is the stonework elaborate, but the surviving fragment of metal is a piece of unusually fine and delicate engraving.

The tomb has been popularly associated with the family of John Leggare, because he 'decorated' the window of this transept—as an inscription in an unaccustomed place, the outside moulding of the window, informs us—for the welfare of the souls of his father and mother. Leggare was a Burford man, who appears in the Records once as feoffee of the church lands in 1487, and later as the founder of an obit. But there is nothing to suggest that he would have been of such position as to erect so elaborate a monument, and it is, moreover, unlikely that, if he did, his petition for prayers for the souls of his parents would have appeared on the outside of the window;

he would have placed it upon the tomb, if the William buried there were his father.

The following extracts from early Burford wills at Somerset House, kindly taken by Mr. Michael W. Hughes, add several interesting details to our knowledge of Burford church in the Middle Ages, and afford one or two important identifications. For instance, from the will of John Pynnok, 1486, the chapel of the Holy Trinity can be placed. We know from the notes of Sir Richard Lee in 1574 that the arms of Pynnok, with the date 1485, were in the chapel containing the brass of John Pynnok, senior, 1474, and that this was the south chancel chapel. This, therefore, was the chapel of the Holy Trinity, and it was rebuilt by Pynnok. Hence we may perhaps further conclude that St. Katherine's chapel, which evidently ranked equal in importance with that of the Holy Trinity in the minds of Burford men, was the north chancel chapel, in which the Tanfield tomb now stands.

Other points made clear are : (i) that there was in the Lady Chapel a separate altar of St. Anne ; (ii) that there was a cross or rood in the churchyard. We also have the very interesting addition of St. Roch to the list of known lights in the church.

The monuments of the sixteenth century are not such as add beauty to the church. There are none belonging to the first half of the century, the earliest being the Harman monument of 1569, which is dull and uninspired in workmanship. The most curious feature of it is the introduction of figures of Red Indians. The other tombs of this century are all of one type, and it is a type which can hardly be called beautiful. It may be described as a half-altar tomb placed against the wall, decorated in front with strap-work and panels for inscription, and with a rising back-piece carved with detached devices—merchants' marks, stars or starfish, &c. These tombs begin with that of Edmund Sylvester, who died in 1568, and most of them are tombs of that family. One, in the south chancel chapel, commemorating Richard Rainoldes, who was Bailiff at the time of Queen Elizabeth's visit in 1574, bears the quaint and touching words: 'I go to sleepe before you & wee shall wake togeather'.

To the seventeenth century belong a brass of 1624 in the Lady Chapel to John Osbaldeston and his wife (a branch of this Chadlington family had some property here); monuments to Richard Sindrey and John Warren, which show better craftsmanship in stone, and come from the same hand as the great mantelpiece at the Priory; and the Bartholomew monuments in the south chancel chapel, notable for their good lettering (which is a partially redeeming feature of some of the later Sylvester monuments). Two brasses of this period which still remain on tombs in the churchyard may also be mentioned; one to John Hunt, mercer, of 1608, and one of 1651 to Elizabeth White, who 'willingly and peaceably exchanged her vile enjoyments here for those rich, precious and unspeakable'. In St. Thomas's Chapel is a half-length figure monument of John Harris, 1674, in painted stone, good of its kind ; it was the Burford Burgesses' acknowledgement of his generous bequest to the charities of the town where he was born. Good lettering again distinguishes the stone in the south transept to the memory of the murdered John Pryor ;¹ but it is with difficulty that we decipher the inscription over the sacristy door to 'Mr. Nathaniel Brooks Gent. a truly honest man' (1695).²

The principal monument, however, of this century is of course the ornate erection by the 'noble and verteous lady' Tanfield to her most honoured husband 'in memory of his vertues and her sorrows'. It is a fine example of its kind ; for while parts of the canopy decoration, such as the cherubs' heads and carved bosses, have a rather stuck-on appearance, the modelling of the symbolical figures placed on the capitals of the pillars is fine and delicate, and the carving of the recumbent effigies is full of character. The introduction of the small figures kneeling at the heads and feet of the effigies—the Tanfields' daughter who married the first Lord Falkland, and their grandson, the famous Falkland—adds much charm to the monument. It may perhaps be added that the long Latin inscription at the foot of the monument, though rather obscure in meaning, seems to betray some disappointment on Lady Tanfield's part that her husband had not been interred in a more notable spot—Westminster Abbey, we may presume.

It used to be thought that this monument was the work of Nicholas Stone ; but it is now known definitely that he did not design it.

It is interesting, after this view of the existing monuments, to refer to the accounts of the church given first by Sir Richard Lee in 1574, and secondly by an antiquarian visitor in 1660.³ They show, for one thing, how comparatively little we have lost since the sixteenth century.

² Mr. Brooks lived in a house between the Almshouse and the churchyard, where the Church Schools now stand. See Part III, p. 364.

³ Brit. Mus. Harl. MSS. 4170. Printed in The Topographer, vol. ii (1790), pp. 349–53.

Sir Richard Lee is chiefly concerned with coats of arms in the glass of the windows and on escutcheons in the stonework of the building. But he mentions, as we have seen, the tomb in the south transept; and he also describes the Harman monument. The only other tomb he enters on his notes is lost: 'On a graveston Pynnok as before¹ impaling a lion rampant guardant (untinctured) Over it written John Pynnok maricator and Elein his wife mccccclxxiv'.

Another lost Pynnok monument is recorded by the 1660 visitor thus: 'Nigh hence on a brasse on the ground Hic jacet Joñes Pinnock primogenitus Thome Pinnock gentleman quondam societa- de Greisiñe qui quidem Joñes obiit v die Augusti MCCCCLXXXX cujus etc'. The matrix of this brass remains.

This visitor identifies for us the monument in the north-east corner of the south chancel chapel, now without a name, though the mark of the brass plate is still visible. The inscription copied in 1660 ran: 'Here lyeth the body of George Symmons Gent. sometime dwelling in the house near the bridge foot, being a good benefactor to the poore people of this towne and departed this life the xxvii day of January 1590 God be prayسد for him'. The house here mentioned is the one George Symons calls 'my now dwelling house called cobhall' in the will by which he left it to the poor of Burford. The entrance arch to the courtyard can be seen in the wall between the Vicarage and the river.

A tomb has disappeared from the Tanfield chapel; the 1660 visitor, after describing the Tanfield monument, proceeds: 'On an old raised monument of stone in this chappell this at the feet

Obitus Thome Frieri Burfordiae epitaphius, qui vita excessit 5^o Novembris anno dñi 1572'; and he adds some Latin verses from the monument chiefly remarkable for containing a hexameter with seven feet.²

'In the north ile of the church', the visitor says, '2 proportions', or, as we should now say, effigies. Both of these have disappeared ; but perhaps two large stone fragments preserved in the room over the porch may be relics of them. One piece is the half of a tilting helmet, such as is customarily found supporting the head of an armed figure on a tomb ; the other piece, though it is difficult to recognize what it has been, may be the haunches of a dog or lion placed at the feet of an effigy. The lack in Burford history of resident lords of the manor, or other men likely to have armed effigies, makes these fragments the more interesting. Possibly one of them may have been on a monument to Robert Harcourt, seneschal of the town in 1465, and also seneschal here for the King-maker.

² Thomas Freer appears frequently in the Burford Records; he was one of the original feoffees of the Grammar School lands.

Finally, the 1660 visitor mentions the altar tomb in the north-west corner of the Lady Chapel bearing the Barber Surgeons' arms, but even then the name on it had been lost.

Comment on the monuments would be incomplete without a remark on the extraordinary fact that, with the exception of a tablet erected within the last few years to a descendant of the family, who died in Australia in 1894, there is not a single memorial to any of the Lenthalls in the church. More than twenty of them lie buried here,¹ including six who were lords of the town and manor ; and to no one of them is there any monument. Speaker Lenthall, it is true, left particular instructions that he was not to be commemorated in any such way ; his burial place was to have no mark, save 'at the utmost a plain stone with this inscription only, "Vermis sum" '. Even that stone is no longer to be seen ; it appears to have been broken accidentally during some repairing of the church. His son John died at Besselsleigh, and was buried there. But five succeeding owners of the Priory estate lie in Burford church, each of whom might have been expected to leave some memorial behind him.

The coats of arms recorded by Sir Richard Lee, several of which appear also in Symonds's Notes of 1644 and the Notes of the visitor of 1660, have many points of interest. Most of them have a traceable connexion with the history of Burford ; and they may in some instances help to date portions of the fabric. The coats of de Clare, Despenser, and Beauchamp, as lords of the manor, appeared frequently. The Stafford coat, which the 1660 visitor records, was due to the sub-infeudations of the manor; Hugh, Earl of Stafford, held in 1387, by right of his descent, the half knight's fee originally held in Burford by the de Fanencourts. The visitor enters this coat as 'in the chappell on the south side' in one of the windows. 'The chapel' in the sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Notes nearly always seems to mean the Lady Chapel. But in this case the visitor has just been describing the tombs in the Lady Chapel, and must obviously be referring to another part when he recommences 'in the chapel on the south side'. As he goes on immediately to the nameless monument in the south transept, it would seem certain that in this case he is speaking of the chapel of St. Thomas of Canterbury; and the presence of the Stafford coat there would not be inconsistent with the other indications of the date of that chapel.

Lee, on the other hand, only speaks of one 'chapel', and it may therefore be taken that the following coats he records were in the Lady Chapel.

Skochens in the top of the chapel :

Gules three padlocks or

Where these escutcheons were placed does not now appear; they may have been on bosses of the roof, and have been lost when, in the late eighteenth century, this roof was in grievous decay. At any rate, the presence among these coats of the Beauchamp coat—the fess and cross crosslets—would imply that the part of the building where it appeared is of a date subsequent to 1439, when the manor passed by marriage to the Beauchamp family. As Symonds records 'in the southe yle of the south-west yle where the 2 Bayliffs etc sit'—clearly the old Gild chapel and present Lady Chapel—the Beauchamp coat with the de Clare coat, it becomes more likely that Lee also was referring to this part of the church.

Lee records in one of the windows the following coats: Parted per saltire sable and gules on a fess or between three lions' heads erased argent three roses azure seeded or in base a cross crosslet of the last; and the same coat impaling argent a saltire azure between four woodpeckers proper (Woodward) —' Over it written John Pynnok and iii wyfes mccccxxxv.' Symonds gives these as 'in a southe windowe and southe yle of the church'.

Symonds also records the coats of arms on seven of the eight shields held by angels just below the battlements of the great south porch; and with his help, though the shields are now much ravaged by weather, six are still just decipherable. On the extreme left is the bear and ragged staff; next it is a strange charge of a lion passant on the point of a sword in pale, hilt downwards; and next that the coat with three padlocks, already noted in the Lady Chapel, which was the coat of Sydenham of Tichmersh, one of whom married a Lovel of Minster Lovell,¹ and may have given money to the building of the porch. The fourth shield Symonds does not figure, and it almost looks now as if it had always been blank. The fifth has the three leopards of England; the sixth, the cross fleury and martlets of Edward the Confessor, not now decipherable; the seventh, the three crowns of St. Edmund the King; and the eighth, so far destroyed now that hardly even the shield itself is left, bore the three chevronels of de Clare.

The interesting point about these shields is that they include the device of the Nevilles, the bear and ragged staff, but do not include the Beauchamp coat which was in the Lady Chapel. Now the town and manor passed from the Beauchamps to the Nevilles by the marriage of Lady Anne Beauchamp to the King-maker in 1449. The lengthening of the old Gild chapel and the building of the south porch which it was made to adjoin must have both been part of a single plan. But the fact that the Beauchamp arms without the Neville device were in the chapel, and the Neville device without the Beauchamp arms is on the porch, shows that the chapel was finished before the building of the porch had reached its last stages. We also thus have proof that the whole plan belongs to the middle years of the fifteenth century.

Of the interior arrangements of the church during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries we have little knowledge. Symonds records in his Notes that Essex quartered his army in the church on June 6, 1643, and 'used it with the greatest incivillity', in especial tearing down the pennons and flags hanging over the Tanfield monument and wearing them as scarves. But of any extensive and systematic destruction by Puritans we have no record. Since Lee mentions so few coats of arms as existing in windows in 1574 we may take it that the painted windows had shared the fate of the altars and lights in the days of the Reformation.

In the seventeenth century a gallery was erected at the west end of the church; and it was probably in consequence of this that the Burgesses moved out of their original chapel and converted the chapel of St. Thomas of Canterbury into the Corporation pew. The new gallery would very likely obstruct the view from the Lady Chapel. They can hardly have made the change before the end of the seventeenth century, because the monument erected by the Burgesses to John Harris in 1674, now in St. Thomas's Chapel, used to be in the Lady Chapel, and it would almost certainly have been placed by them in their own portion of the church.

In 1826 considerable changes took place, of which we have unusually exact record. The Rev. Alexander Dallas was at that time curate-in-charge, the vicar (the Rev. William Birch) being non-resident. Mr. Dallas had been an officer in the Army, and had fought in the Peninsular War; and he carried his military energy into his church work. He was a reformer of abuses in the town charities, and he repaired and re-pewed the church with zeal, if not with knowledge.

The result of his alterations is preserved for us not only in a ground plan, dated 1827, now in the room over the porch, but still more vividly in an exact and beautifully made model of the church, which is kept in the same place.¹ The western gallery, being then decayed, was removed, and another put up in the north aisle. The font was moved to a position near the Harman monument. The pulpit, much exalted, was placed at the west end of the nave, facing east, and the pews were set to face westwards.

These peculiar arrangements disappeared forty years later, when, unfortunately, the organ was removed from the position it had hitherto occupied, on what had been the Rood loft. Some of the work done at this time is to be deplored ; but the fabric of the church was badly in need of attention. The Rev. J. H. Burgess was vicar when the work was taken in hand ; and on his resignation the Rev. W. A. Cass carried it on with zeal until the greater part of the necessary repairs had been completed. The modern glass, by Kempe, in the western windows and the windows of the north aisle was put in during Mr. Cass's time, with the exception of one in the north aisle which is in memory of him.

Since his death, the roofs of the porch, the Lady Chapel, and the Tanfield Chapel have been repaired and re-leaded, and the Tanfield monument strengthened. Generous friends of the church have given the window, by Whall, in the south transept ; and have erected the Reredos in the Lady Chapel, of Campden stone, and re-floored the same chapel with local stone, recovering from beneath the former floor several memorial slabs and two matrices of brasses, which are placed at the west end near the door.

A list of the vicars of Burford, made as accurate as is possible at present, is appended. A curious feature of it is the large number of appointments during the sixteenth century—no fewer than eleven men succeeded one another in the vicarage in the course of a hundred years. They were, as a rule, after the time of Thomas Cade,² non-resident. The vicars of the seventeenth century, on the contrary, were few in number, and three of them were certainly resident, though John Thorpe actually lived at Fulbrook. Neither Hill nor Glynn deserves to be remembered very gratefully, as a later note will show, though it must be admitted that they seem on the whole to have kept the Registers with care. Their successor, however, John Thorpe, stands out as one of the best of Burford vicars—upright, honourable, and faithful to his charge. Unhappily he was succeeded by one of the worst of the vicars, John Eykyn, who, though presented by the churchwardens in 1704 for all kinds of scandalous behaviour and neglect of duty,¹ not only remained vicar till his death in 1734, but even acquired in 1718 a plurality, the Rectory of Farmington near Northleach. It would appear, however, that he had to leave Burford; for his handwriting disappears from Burford Registers after August 1706, and there follow various handwritings at intervals of several years, no doubt those of curates in charge. After Eykyn's presentation to Farmington he must, indeed, have resided there entirely, for the Registers there are in his handwriting from May 1719 to May 1734. He is buried with the wife whom, according to the Burford churchwardens, he treated so scandalously, in Farmington church.²

Very few monuments to vicars have been preserved in the church. Possibly some vanished brasses may have marked the graves of mediaeval vicars; but in view of the constant changes in Elizabethan times we cannot be surprised that the vicars of that period have left no memorials. We might, how-the Rev. H. E. Salter, Oxford Historical Society, 1913, pp. 259 and 260) deduction is allowed from the stipend of Cade, as vicar, for a curate, Nicholas Swynerton. Mr. Salter is of opinion that such a deduction was only allowed when the incumbent was doing ecclesiastical work elsewhere or was studying at the University; and that the word 'curatus', here applied to Swynerton, always implied 'curate-in-charge'. The curate of Fulbrook, William Wryters, is separately entered. Cade was not yet Master of the Hospital. Therefore it would appear, if Mr. Salter's view admits of no exceptions, that Cade must at this time have been non-resident. It may however be noted that his predecessor also had employed a curate; one of the witnesses to Agnes Stodam's gift to the church in 1512 (see Part III, p. 321) was 'William Calaway Curate of Burford'.

ever, have expected tablets to Philip Hill and Christopher Glynn. John Thorpe's monument, recording also his grief at the early death of two promising sons, is in Fulbrook church. The Right Hon. and Rev. Charles Knollis, 'Earl of Banbury', who was vicar 1747-71, is commemorated by a tablet in Burford church, and the inscription, which tells us that it was erected by his two youngest sons, preserves the memory of his son and successor, Francis Knollis. The connexion of the Rev. Alexander Dallas with the church is perpetuated by a very plain tablet in the north-west corner of the north transept recording the brief life of an infant child of his; a tablet to his own memory is to be seen in St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin.

THE VICARS OF BURFORD

The following list has been compiled from the Lincoln Rolls and Registers, and from the Oxford Diocesan Register after the creation of the See of Oxford, with the addition from other sources of some names not found in the Registers. There is every reason to suppose that, with the exception of a gap in the thirteenth century caused by the loss of one of the Lincoln Rolls, the list is complete. The year of institution is still lacking in a few instances; but dates obtained in these cases from other sources are such as to render it at least probable that no intermediate names are missing.

Grateful acknowledgement of assistance given in the compiling of this list is due to Mr. A. Hamilton Thompson, who very kindly searched the Lincoln muniments, and, besides supplying several fresh names, provided the dates of the institution of some men, whose tenure of the vicarage had, indeed, been known, but without those specific dates which of course can alone establish the due succession of the vicars. Equal acknowledgement is due to the Rev. S. S. Pearce, Vicar of Combe, Oxon., whose unrivalled acquaintance with the sources of information on this subject in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries has added many names to the list. Thanks are also due to Mr. Michael W. Hughes and Mr. Harry Paintin for additional references and information.

SOME HISTORICAL NOTES ON CHURCH AFFAIRS
IN BURFORD*The Alleged Synod at Burford*

The earliest recorded event of ecclesiastical history connected with Burford is, unfortunately, of doubtful authenticity. A synod is said to have been held here in A. D. 685; but the sole ground of support for the statement is a charter of questionable genuineness in the Register of Malmesbury Abbey. The terms of the charter are as follows:

'Ea que secundum timorem et amorem domini religiosa largitionis devotione difficiuntur, quamvis solus sermo sufficeret, tamen pro incerta futurorum temporum conditione scriptis publicis et documentorum gestis sunt confirmanda. Quapropter ego Berhtuualdus regnante domino rex pro remedio animae meae et indulgentia commissorum criminum aliquam terram conferre largirique Aldelmo abbati decreveram id est illam de orientali plaga fluminis cuius vocabulum est Temis iuxta vadum qui appellatur Sumerford xl cassatos ea scilicet definitione ut omni servitute saecularium potestatum portio terrae illius perpetualiter sit libera ad serviendum necessitatibus monachorum deo servientium in monasterio quod nominatur Maeldubesburg. Et ut firmitus ac tenacius haec devotio in perpetuum roboretur etiam precellentissimum monarchum Aethelredum regem ad testimonium axivimus cuius consensu et confirmatione haec munificentia acta est. Si quis contra hanc donationem venire temptaverit aut tyrannica fretus potestate violenter invaserit sciat se in tremendo cunctorum examine coram Christo rationem redditurum. Actum publice in synodo iuxta vadum Berghford mense Iulio tricesimo die eiusdem Indictione xiii^a anno ab incarnatione domini sexcentesimo xxxv.¹

Dr. Stubbs, when entering this charter in the third volume of Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents,² adds the comment that it is 'a questionable charter', and does not transcribe

² Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents, Haddon and Stubbs, vol. iii, p. 169.

it. Dr. Plummer, in a note in his edition of Bede's Ecclesiastical History, referring to William of Malmesbury's Life of St. Aldhelm, says: 'The rest of Malmesbury's work is largely made up of extracts from Aldhelm's letters, and Malmesbury charters, most of the latter being of very doubtful authenticity.'

Thus the single record of the alleged synod at Burford is under suspicion, to say the least, both from one of the greatest modern authorities on charters in general and also from one of the greatest modern authorities on ecclesiastical charters in particular. It is pertinent, therefore, to remark first, that Burford was not a place likely to be chosen for the meeting of a synod, being remote from any important centre of the ecclesiastical life of the time; and secondly, that at this period of hatred and hostility between Wessex and Mercia it was improbable, on the face of it, that Berhtwaldus, a vicegerent of the royal power in Mercia, and Ethelred, King of Mercia, would be concerned in a gift of land to the great churchman of Wessex, Aldhelm.

Yet the synod has always had an appearance of great authenticity in the modern accounts given of it, for they are amplified with detail of discussion at this alleged synod. They go on to relate, in connexion with the gift to Aldhelm, the historic facts of a controversy about the date of Easter, as to which the British Church was in error. But this connexion has sprung from a confusion of two distinct synods, for which Camden, in his Britannia, must be held responsible. He writes in his account of Burford:

Here was held a council 682 by the Kings Etheldred and Berhtwald, at which Aldhelm, Abbot of Malmesbury, afterwards Bishop of Shirburn, being present, was commanded to write against the error of the British Church in the observance of Easter (Bede, Eccl. Hist. v. 18). Spelman calls this a Mercian Synod, and dates it 705, without fixing any place, or the exact time; whereas both are evident from Malmesbury (De Pontif. v) and the leiger book of that Abbey.¹

Denique Aldhelmus cum erat adhuc presbyter et Abbas monasterii quod Maildulf urbem nominant, scripsit, iubente Synodo suae gentis, librum egregium adversus errorem Britonum, quo vel Pascha suo tempore celebrant, vel alia perplura ecclesiasticae castitati et paci contraria gerunt. Multosque eorum, qui Occidentalibus Saxonibus subditi erant Britones, ad Catholicam Dominici Paschae celebrationem huius lectione perduxit.¹

Faricius, in his Life of Aldhelm, dates this synod with some care. His version is :

Regnante Anglorum rege Osredo anno Dominicæ Incarnationis septingentesimo sexto, quidam Britonum nomine tenus praesules haeretizabant de Paschali termino et de aliis pluribus ecclesiasticae orthodoxitatis institutionibus. Quare Saxonum Orientalis (sic) plagae sancta synodus venerabilem Aldhelmum abbatem, et adhuc tantum presbyterum (nondum enim sanctus vita et moribus in ordine ponebatur pontificum) pro sanctitatis suae reverentia rogavit librum componere egregium, quo maligna quae tunc supra modum pullulabat haeresis Britonum destrueretur.²

Apart from this fixing of the date of the synod concerning Easter there are two points to note in these references. Firstly, if at this synod Aldhelm had received a gift of land, it is unlikely that Bede, with his admiration for Aldhelm and his concern for the details of Aldhelm's life, would not have known of it, and thus fixed the scene of the synod. Secondly (and more significantly), both Bede and Faricius speak of the synod as a synod of the Wessex people.³ This could not conceivably have taken place in what was at that time Mercian territory. It is quite clear that the synod concerning Easter cannot be identified with the occasion on which the alleged gift of land to Aldhelm was made.

This confusion of two separate events, in which Camden has been followed by all who have since written of Burford, being cleared away, there remains no authority for the supposed synod at Burford except the Malmesbury charter; and that is hardly good enough to rely upon.

The Rectory and Vicarage

It will therefore be safer to regard Church history in Burford, apart from that which is inscribed in the structure of the Parish Church, as beginning with the gift of the Rectory of Burford and the chapelry of Fulbrook to the Abbey of Keynsham by William, Earl of Gloucester, the founder of the Abbey. In the charter granted to the Abbey by Gilbert de Clare, confirming gifts made by Earl William, occurs the following clause :

Concessi etiam et confirmavi dictis canonicis ad sustentationem suam quantum ad advocatum et dominum fundi pertinet omnes ecclesias quas W comes avus meus eisdem canonicis concessit scilicet in Bristoll ecclesiam S. Mariae et S. Werburgae et ecclesiam S. Sepulchri et ecclesiam S. Iohannis Baptistae in Bureford cum capella de Fulebrook et omnibus aliis pertinenciis suis. . . .¹

The foundation of Keynsham Abbey took place between 1167 and 1172 ; and we have therefore to give the same dates to the acquisition by Keynsham of the Rectory and advowson of Burford. Perhaps we may ascribe to the influence of these new patrons the building of that Norman church of which such considerable portions have survived.

A certain amount of land would, of course, go with the church—the rectorial and vicarial glebe of later times—and a portion of this land must have been the ground upon which the Rectory and Vicarage were built. The Vicarage is first mentioned in the Burford Records in 1384 in a grant of certain houses standing between the Vicarage and the river Windrush.² No rectory house is mentioned at anything like so early a date by that specific name. But in the Taxatio Ecclesiastica of circa 1291 the Abbot of Keynsham is entered for an annual rent of 3s. in Burford as his temporality, apart from the Rectorial revenues ; and the same rent appears in a Clerical Subsidy of 1450-1.³ Some grants among the Burford Records dated 1435 and 1445, concerning a house standing next to the Vicarage on one side, describe it as being bounded on the other side by 'a house of the Abbot of Keynsham'.¹ It is possible that this was the earliest Rectory house, leased to tenants (since there was no resident Rector) and standing, like the Vicarage, in the High Street, upon the front edge, so to speak, of the church land in this part of Burford, the ground behind being left open meadow, as the ground behind the Vicarage is to-day.

No other mention of the Rectory occurs until the year 1546, when Edmund Harman obtained a grant of this portion of the possessions of Keynsham. It was at that time in the tenancy of Thomas Baylie, who had obtained in 1532 a lease from the Abbey for ninety years at an annual rent of £10.² This lease would, of course, include all the glebe and temporalities of the Rectory, the advowson remaining in the hands of the Abbey; the size of the rent shows that more than a house was being leased. At the same time, there certainly must have been a house; for the Memoranda upon Harman's grant speak of 'the said parsonage', and of 'the trees growing about the scytuacion of the saide parsonage'; and since 'the hedgs inclosing the gleybe lands' are mentioned separately, it is quite clear that 'the parsonage' was a house with grounds around it.

It may by this time have been on the site of the present Rectory house, for although the main frontage of the existing building is of a period much later than this, there is older work in the back wing of the house, and also in the wing at the north end.

When Harman obtained the Rectory the lease to Baylie had apparently ceased to be valid, or else it was surrendered, for Harman made a new lease to Thomas Smyth 'generosus', for a term of sixty years, at the enhanced rent of £15, an annual payment of 20s. to the Crown being reserved. In the following year, 1547, Harman made an exchange of lands with the College of Fotheringhay, and the Rectory passed into the possession of the College. In 1584, the College having ceased to exist, a new grant of the Rectory was obtained by Mary, Edmund Harman's daughter, for the term of three lives—her own, that of her husband, William Johnson, and that of their son, Harman Johnson.¹ It appears from the terms of this last grant that the lease to Thomas Smyth still held good, and had not been disturbed by the exchange of 1547.

Meanwhile the advowson had become in some curious way detached from the tenure of the Rectory. It had passed with the Rectory to the Crown upon the surrender of Keynsham Abbey, for the presentation in 1542 was made by the Crown. It was also included in the grant to Harman, and must have gone to the College of Fotheringhay in the exchange, for the Edward Sandys, 'generosus', who presented to the Vicarage in 1551, cannot be traced as having any connexion with Burford, and must have presented by some right derived from the College. But then occur three presentations, in 1555, 1558, and 1571 by Sir Edward Unton and his wife, Anne, Countess of Warwick, who held for her life the lordship of the town and manor.² How these two came to be exercising the patronage does not appear. But the result was that, when, upon the Countess of Warwick's death, the lordship reverted to the Crown, the advowson reverted with it, and presentations continued to be made by the Crown, even after the grant of the Rectory to Mary Johnson.

In 1611 the patronage appears for the first time in the hands of the Bishop of Oxford, where it has since rested continuously. But the Rectory remained separated from the advowson, and was being leased out by the Crown, the three lives of Mary Johnson's grant having evidently expired. In 1613 it was in the hands of two men named Reginald Edwards and Humfry Repington; in 1618 Sir Lawrence Tanfield was in possession; and after his death it came into the hands of Robert Veysey of Chimney.³ While it is possible that Harman Johnson may have lived in the Rectory house, it is clear that these others merely held the Rectory for the sake of the rents to be derived from the glebe. Edwards and Repington appear in no local documents; Tanfield had his fine new house at the Priory; and when Robert Veysey died in 1634, there was nothing to be valued in the Rectory house except a few odds and ends put away in a chest, and 'in the chamber over the hall'; he had houses at Ducklington, Bradwell, and Taynton, as well as the house at Chimney, where he principally lived. He would appear only to have rented the Rectory house, for the Book of Church Officers shows that the lay rectorship was held by Lady Tanfield after her husband's death, and then by Lord Falkland, since the appointment of Rector's churchwardens continues in their names. The same evidence shows that the rectorship went with the other Priory possessions to Lenthall; but for some reason he took other steps later on to confirm his possession of it. Whitelocke records, on May 4, 1649: 'An Act passed for settling the rectory and glebe lands of Burford upon a member.'¹ It remained in Lenthall hands for more than a century, and ultimately became reunited to the advowson, for in 1741 it was in the possession of the Bishop of Oxford, having become part of the endowment of the bishopric. He leased it in that year to Elizabeth Clarke Pryor, widow of John Pryor—probably grandson of the John Pryor who was murdered in the Priory garden. The lease which she obtained was for three lives, and was prolonged, as appears by an endorsement, for four lives more.²

Unfortunately there is no means of identifying the builder of the Rectory house. It is a finer piece of building than we should be inclined, on the evidence of the Priory structure, to attribute to any Lenthall, being a beautiful example of a type described in the succeeding chapter, distinguished by carefully finished ashlar work uninterrupted by ornament, high sash-window openings framed with a broad shallow moulding, and a great simplicity of outline. The later Pryor connexion just makes possible the conjecture that the murdered John Pryor may have built this house, and lived in it. He was probably, as William Lenthall's agent and the trustee under his will, a man of some means. We know also that he had some interest in the Rectory, for an entry in John Thorpe's 'Booke for the Vicaridge Rights' describes how Thorpe on one occasion, being at the house of a Mrs. Matthews with John Pryor, had seen the latter take away a terrier of the Rectorial glebe written upon parchment. However, that is not enough to make more than guess-work of the idea that John Pryor may have built the present house.

The Vicarage, we may conclude from the earliest extant reference to it, has from the first occupied its present site. Of the existing building the oldest portion is in the wing furthest removed from the street, the ground-floor room of which is of the sixteenth century. To whom the addition of the charming street façade, of the year 1672, is due is not known. John Thorpe, the vicar of that date, was certainly a man of means, and might have built it; but as he lived in Fulbrook it is at least equally possible that the building was done by some tenant to whom he had let the Vicarage. In the nineteenth century the central part of the house was rebuilt, in the time of Mr. Cooper.

The Glebe Lands

The history of the glebe lands of Burford is rather a disgraceful one. The secularization of the Rectorial glebe is, indeed, no different here from what it was in the hundreds of parishes of which the Rectories were held by monastic foundations, and were made sources of profit to the Crown after the Dissolution by sale or lease to lay impropiators.

But the Vicarial glebe, which had escaped this fate, was subject in Burford, in the succeeding century, to manipulations which, though not in the truest sense more scandalous, were certainly more mean and underhand. The annual value of the Vicarage is entered on the Clerical Subsidies of the fifteenth century at £6 13s. 4d., which, though not a large sum, even when all allowances have been made for the different value of money, nevertheless represents a sufficiency of glebe land, in addition to the small tithes. Unfortunately the two Vicars of Burford in the early seventeenth century, Philip Hill and Christopher Glynn, seem to have been little more than creatures of the lords of the manor; and they allowed Tanfield and Speaker Lenthall to obtain complete possession of the glebe in exchange for comfortable payments during their own lives.

We have what is virtually contemporary evidence of these transactions. Glynn's successor was a man of a very different type, John Thorpe, who by every record or indication that he has left must have been a straightforward, painstaking man. Preserved now among the registers is a little quarto book, bound in limp vellum and inscribed on the cover: 'Burford Booke for the Vicaridge Rights'.¹ It contains John Thorpe's notes, made chiefly between 1674 and 1680, on the existing vicarial tithes and a little glebe, and also the story of what had happened to the rest of the glebe. Thorpe had the story in the main from Mr. Benjamin Griffin, who was at that time 'Minister of Barrington Magna', and had been the usher at Burford Grammar School in Christopher Glynn's time. His account was that sixty or seventy years before the date at which John Thorpe was writing there had been 'an Agreement Between the Bishop, the Parson, & the vicar of Burford, about stateing every mans Right'. There could hardly have been any real uncertainty as to the respective glebes, but this nominal reason for the 'agreement'² is in the next few sentences revealed as a mere blind. 'It was agreed that the Parson (who was Tanfeild) should pay the vicar 80*l*. per Ann. for his maintenance & the parson should take all the vicars dues, whereupon some have told mee, as one Robert Hayter shoemaker they Remember the L^d Tanfeilds servants gather (sic) for their master the very Easter offerings.' There would have been no great harm in this arrangement, though of course it was unwise and impolitic of a vicar, for the sake of the convenience of an outright annual cash payment, to allow a layman to enforce the tithes. But Tanfield had other plans as well.

In a short time the Powerfull Lord persuades y^e Vicar to Let him keep these 4 yards of Glebe called the vicars Lands & to take for the vicaridge all the other profitts here but Tanfeild during Hill the vicars Life would make up the Losse of these Lands procuring for him Eaton³ a Living of a 100*l*. per Ann. besides this place &c. & after many years Mr. Christopher Glin enters who rec^d Advantages from Mr. W^m Lenthall above 40*l*. a year.

² Eaton Hastings, Berks.

In other words, Philip Hill having been made comfortable for his lifetime, Christopher Glynn agreed to follow the same course, without regard to the interests of later Vicars. They exchanged the permanent possessions of the vicarage for what was only a personal arrangement with themselves. John Thorpe, coming into the vicarage, found practically no glebe left, except what lay in Fulbrook; and, as he says, 'so many years and alterations being past and no script of anything left mee by the vicars precedent I am wholly at a Losse what to doe'. He was not without evidence of a kind. Apart from Mr. Griffin's story there was the fact of four yard lands (nearly 200 acres) being called 'Vicars lands', held 'with a more than ordinary number of sheep commons', and tithe-free—all of which Thorpe duly records. He had an idea of searching 'Lincolne Records', in order to discover the true conditions of the glebe in earlier times. But whether he ever did so or not, he has no more researches to enter in his book.

Thorpe's successor, John Eykyn, was certainly not a man to interest himself in the vicar's legal rights. So more 'years and alterations' went past; and the glebe which Tanfield had so meanly acquired, and Speaker Lenthall hardly less meanly retained, was lost for good. In the Enclosure Award of 1797 no allotment for Vicarial glebe appears at all.

The Rectorial glebe, returning to the hands of the Bishop of Oxford after the expiry of the prolonged lease of the Rectory to the Pryor family, was ultimately handed over to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who now make from the proceeds an allowance for the payment of a curate.

The Churchwardens

At the earliest date at which churchwardens are mentioned in the Burford Records, and for several hundred years afterwards, they were four in number. They appear, in the first regular lists of the parish officers, which begin in 1613, as holding office thus: one for the Rector, one for the Vicar, and two for the township, pro villa.

Upon the origin of this rather unusual custom we have very little light. In the course of the controversy of 1738-43, over the administration of the charities, there was some discussion of the position of the four churchwardens. The Royal Commission of 1738 had ordained that in several charities with which the churchwardens had then no concern they should be joined with the Bailiffs and Burgesses. The latter took exception to these orders, largely on the ground that the two churchwardens for the township were generally under the influence of the lord of the manor, and did not fairly represent the mind of the people. But the two interesting points put forward by the Bailiffs and Burgesses were these—first, that the Rector's churchwarden certainly ought to have no voice in the town charities, because the Rector's nomination was on behalf of 'the outward tythings' of Upton and Signett; and, secondly, that, strictly, one of the township churchwardens was the representative of the Corporation.

The respondents in the case, while not contesting the former point, denied entirely that the Bailiffs and Burgesses had ever enjoyed the right of electing a churchwarden of their own. Yet no alternative explanation of the existence of two wardens for the township was offered. If the representative of 'the outward tythings' had been one of these two, the system would have been comprehensible; but no attempt was made to maintain that position. It may, in fact, have been the truth; for it seems unlikely that the Rector would have any special reason to nominate the warden for those tythings. It is more probable that originally his warden fulfilled the normal duty of representing the owner of the chancel of the church; the Rectory being inappropriate, a Vicar's warden also had been elected; and, as happened elsewhere, the township being in two distinct portions, parishioners' wardens were elected for each. But when the Rectory passed to lay hands, and had been held for some time by men who were also lords of the manor, with their chief interests in Upton and Signett, the most natural explanation of their nomination of a warden, in the minds of men who had no knowledge of the original system, was that this warden was the Upton and Signett warden. Then, in order to account for the two parishioners' wardens, the theory of a Corporation warden was invented.

Another explanation is, however, just possible. In mediaeval times, when the Gild Chapel and the Church were separate structures, each had its own 'proctors' or wardens, responsible for the fabric, the ornaments and plate. It may be that, when the chapel became an integral part of the church, the separate responsibility was continued, one of the two Gild proctors acting in conjunction with one of the two church proctors. In other words, the Bailiffs and Burgeses may have had a sound tradition at the back of their claim; and in that case the theory of a warden for Upton and Sighett was really the invention. In support of this it may be remarked that at no point in the existing church records is there any entry of a warden as elected or nominated for the outward tythings.

The normal entries throughout the seventeenth century are: one churchwarden pro rectore, one pro vicario, and two pro villa. But this regularity in the formula is not attained for some time. When Sir Lawrence Tanfield held the Rectory, the Rector's warden is usually entered as 'for my lord being parson', or, in his later years, simply 'for my lord'. In 1626/7 the entry is 'for the Lady Tanfield', and in 1628/9 'for my lady'. This personal formula continues to be used for some years in the entries of a warden 'for Sir Lucius Cary', but gives place in 1630 to one more official in character, but quite unjustifiable, 'pro domino Burgi'; it was not as lord of the town, but as Rector, that Lord Falkland exercised this nomination. It is interesting to observe that in 1638 the words domino Burgi have been erased, and Rectore substituted. We observe the accuracy of the legal mind of William Lenthall, whose first nomination this was. Hereafter pro Rectore is the invariable form.

The two parishioners' wardens are entered for the first twenty years after 1613 as 'for the parish'. This is strong evidence against the later theory that the 'outward tythings' were represented by the Rector's warden; for Upton and Signett were certainly part of the ecclesiastical parish of Burford, and wardens 'for the parish' must have represented the hamlets as well as the town. In one year, 1635, at the time when the Rector's warden was being entered as pro domino Burgi, the parish wardens are entered as pro Burgo, an equally unjustifiable form, since the Burgus excluded part of the parish. It only occurs once, and may have been due to carelessness; or we may perhaps see in it a hint of the theory that Upton and Signett were represented through the Rectorial warden. After this date the use of the form pro villa is uninterrupted.

The custom of four churchwardens continued until the year 1871. For many years the office of Rector's warden had been served by Mr. C. F. A. Faulkner, of Bury Barns. He died in 1870; and in the minutes of the Easter Vestry meeting of 1871 the following passage occurs: 'In consequence of the death of Mr. Allen Faulkner and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, the present Rectors, not having nominated any successor to him as Churchwarden on their part the appointment to this remains in abeyance.'

So it remains to the present day. The parishioners still elect two wardens, and the Vicar nominates one. But no Rector's warden has been nominated since 1871.

The Parish Registers

The Parish Registers of Burford now extant begin in the year 1612, when Philip Hill was Vicar. They appear to have been for the most part carefully kept, without intermission. The only signs of the disturbance of the Civil War in this respect are contained in the Register Book of the Church Officers. Under the date 1642 in that volume occurs the following entry: 'The three churchwardens Richard Veysey, Symon Ward and Henry Hayter being churchwardens the yeare past were continued in the office by the vicar and parishioners for the yeare by reason the government of the church at this time was unsettled.' The Rector, Speaker Lenthall, had nominated a churchwarden as usual. After the next year's date, this note is made: 'There hath beene noe choice made of Churchwardens by reason of troublesome tymes since the 4th day of Aprill 1642 untill the 20th of Aprill 1647.' But meanwhile the Register of Baptisms, Marriages, and Burials shows but slight interruptions.

The Reformation in Burford

The history of Burford in connexion with the Reformation is curious and rather puzzling. The town has no recorded place in the Marian persecutions or on the roll of the Protestant martyrs. Yet at an earlier date it was certainly a centre for the Wycliffites of the neighbourhood, and a resort for those who strove for the possession of the Scriptures in their native tongue. When John Longland, Bishop of Lincoln, made his investigations of heresy in the diocese in 1521, a number of Burford people were informed upon, and there must have been some reason for the selection of the town as one of the places of public penance for offenders. But it must, of course, be added that Longland's heresy hunt was regarded even at the time as a pursuit of trifles, and it does not follow that persons accused before his commissioners were very passionate reformers (indeed the charges in most of the Burford cases border on the ludicrously petty); so that Burford's prominence in those investigations does not necessarily imply a zeal and conviction that would have made it prominent under Mary. In point of fact, all the persons charged in 1521 recanted.

The leaders of the group were John Edmunds, a Burford tailor, with his wife, and John Harris and his wife, of Upton. It was in their houses that meetings were most frequently held. Others who were denounced were Robert Burges and his wife, John Boyes and his brother ('a Monk of Burford'), Edmunds's daughter Agnes, Edward Red, who is described as 'Schoolmaster of Burford', Eleanor Higges, John Through, of the Priory, Roger Dods, Thomas Reiley, Thomas Clemson who was servant to 'the Prior of Burford', Joan Taylor (servant to John Harris), and the brother of Burges's wife. The meetings they held were attended by people from as far away as West Hendred, Ginge near Wantage, and Steventon; and also by some from Witney, Clanfield, Standlake, Asthall, and Lechlade.¹ They met sometimes to hear books read to them—'a book called W. Thorpe' (either, we may presume, the account of his trial written by William Thorpe, the Wycliffite, or his 'Short Testament of his Faith'), 'a book speaking of the Plagues of Pharaoh', 'a Book called Nicodemus's Gospel', in which was 'the story of the destruction of Jerusalem', 'the Book of the Exposition of the Apocalypse', and 'a book called the King of Beeme'. One reading of this kind took place at Harris's house after the marriage of Burges and his wife. At other times they met to hear Joan Edmunds or Alice Colins, whose husband was an Asthall man, recite passages of Scripture, such as the Eight Beatitudes, the Epistles of St. Peter and St. James, and the first chapter of the Gospel of St. John; or the Seven Works of Mercy, the Seven Deadly Sins, the Five Wits bodily and ghostly, and other such things.

All this appeared in accusation against them, together with apparently insignificant charges, such as that they discussed the Apocalypse and the matter of opening the Book with the seven clasps, the seven lean and seven fat oxen, and John the Baptist's foretelling of the One that should come after him 'whose buckle of his shooe he was not worthy to undoe'. Charges of this kind may have had reference to particular tenets of the Lollards. More comprehensible are various charges of speaking against pilgrimages and worship of saints; in this connexion we see John Edmunds as a man of ideals ahead of his time: 'This John Edmunds . . . talking with the said Baker of Pilgrimage, bad him go offer his money to the Image of God. When the other asked, What that was? he said that the Image of God was the poor people, blind and lame.' Against Eleanor Higges there was a charge of saying she should 'burn the Sacrament in an oven'. But that is the single charge of anything inconsistent with a simple piety and religious spirit. Edmunds and John Colins both gave evidence against their fellows and denounced others.

It must be remembered, in considering the apparent triviality of some of the accusations, that the real charge in all the cases was, of course, an attempted independence of the priest's authority, a discussion of spiritual and religious matters not at that time within the competence of the laity, and the holding of religious gatherings in private. The individual accusations are no more than specific instances of what went on at these gatherings, and are evidence rather than charges in the strict sense.

Although all the accused abjured, and many of them gave information, all seem to have been punished; and there is enough to indicate that the punishment was not light. The penances enjoined were of the usual kind. Offenders were to be branded on the cheek, to keep fasts as ordered, and recant all their errors upon the Gospels. They were also to appear in the market-place of Burford, and at certain other towns, on the market-day, to go three times about the market and stand a quarter of an hour on the steps of the market cross, each with a faggot on the shoulder; and on an appointed Sunday to carry faggots in this way in procession and kneel with them on the steps of the High Altar all the time of High Mass. The more drastic part of the punishment has been less noticed. All were committed as prisoners to some monastery or convent, and as a rule to one distant from the offender's home. What this involved may be read between the lines of one of the Bishop's letters, committing a prisoner to Eynsham Abbey. The prisoner is to be put to perpetual penance; no lodging need be provided for him, and his food is to be such as the Abbey usually gives in alms to the poor; if he can do any work useful to the monastery he may have his diet improved as the Abbot sees fit, but he is not to leave the precincts of the Abbey except for his public penance on the appointed days. This kind of committal order in the hands of a severe Abbot must have inflicted a great deal of suffering.

CHAPTER IX

THE TOPOGRAPHY AND POPULATION OF BURFORD

THE position, and with it the date, of the original settlement of inhabitants on the site of Burford, may be deduced from certain marked characteristics of this region of the Cotswolds.

The high ground above the town is part of one of those spurs of the hill-range which, descending from its bold north-westward rampart, form the watersheds of the northern tributaries of the Upper Thames. Between each pair of these streams—between the Churn and the Coln, the Coln and the Windrush, the Windrush and the Evenlode, the Evenlode and the Cherwell—irregular hilly ridges lead down to the great Thames valley.

Now the earliest remains of human habitation, the earthworks of prehistoric man, throughout the Cotswold region have one distinct feature. They are numerous upon the loftier north-westward side; and a few are found advancing, as it were, down the spurs between the rivers. But in every case (save for one isolated instance between the Evenlode and the Cherwell) there is a complete absence of earthworks as the spurs approach the Thames. This is not difficult to understand if the distribution of earthworks on the Cotswolds be regarded in conjunction with their distribution on the hill-ranges of Wiltshire and Berkshire. It then becomes clear that the people who constructed these works, keeping, as they always did, to high ground, discovered that the south-westward trend of the main Cotswold range formed a natural way of avoiding the Thames valley with its swamps and forests. It turned the head-waters of that river, and led between them and the head-waters of the Wiltshire Avon to the southern hills, to Avebury and Stonehenge.

The site of Burford lay off the ground thus traversed.

The nearest earthworks are Windrush Camp, some four and a half miles to the west, and the camp near Aldsworth, to the south-west. The line given by these two shows that the current of that early life, whether coming from Hailes and Roel Gate Camps straight down the watershed by Norbury Camp, or crossing the upper watersheds from the direction of the Rollright Stones by way of Mangersbury and Idbury Camps, avoided the falling ground of the lower Windrush valley, and turned south-westwards to cross to the southern hills by Poulton Camp (Ranbury Ring) and Bury Hill Camp.

This evidence of the earthworks is confirmed by a remarkable difference in the situation of the villages on either side of the line thus drawn. North-west of it lie Stow, Great Rissington, Clapton, Farmington, Aldsworth, Turkdean, and so on—all of them villages on the hills. South-east of it, where the spurs begin to fall, lie the Barringtons, Taynton, Burford, Swinbrook, Asthall, Minster Lovell, Witney—all of them valley settlements.

It may, therefore, be concluded that the original inhabiting of the site of Burford was of comparatively late date, not earlier than the Bronze Age. Small round barrows are the oldest signs of population along the lower Windrush. Neolithic flint implements have, indeed, been found at Burford, but only in insignificant quantity; and they are for the most part the lesser implements, like arrow-heads, such as would be carried for hunting expeditions, which would of course go far afield from the general lines of movement and habitation. They are not enough to disturb the conclusion to be drawn from the very clear differences between the northern and southern portions of this watershed—the earthworks and hill villages of the former, the barrows and river-side villages of the latter.

Yet there is one fact which suggests that within the area of what was to be later the manor and the parish of Burford there may be a trace of a still earlier settlement. A clue to the burh, which usually offers an indication of the site of an original settlement, may be found, for the town of Burford, in Bury Orchard, a piece of ground near the Church, and lying in an angle of the river, exactly where the heart of a valley settlement might be looked for. But, if we are to take this clue, we can hardly neglect another name, that of Bury Barns, a farm at the top of the hill.

In the curious, and often baffling, divisions of the manor between various tenants at later times, after the erection of the borough, two hamlets remained outside the chartered community, that of Upton, near the river, and that of Signett, on the hill not far from Bury Barns. No doubt these two hamlets, as they exist to-day, take their origin from those inhabitants of the feudal manor who, unable or unwilling to enter the burghal status under the charters of Burford, remained on the old terms of tenure of their land; and gradually formed settlements, the position of which was naturally dictated by convenience of access to the common fields and meadows.

But it is also possible that, if the name Bury Barns marks the site of a hill-top burh, another fact should be taken into consideration. Upton and Signett, though members of the ecclesiastical parish of Burford, form a distinct civil parish. Therefore they may represent, not merely a late partition of the inhabitants of the manor, but also a prehistoric settlement which, as being on the hill-top, may be regarded as older than the earliest settlement on the site of the town of Burford.

But again, this conjecture, like the occasional discovery of flint implements, does not affect the conclusion with regard to this latter settlement, that such considerations as can be advanced concerning its probable date do not tend to make it earlier than the Bronze Age.

Of the Roman occupation only slight traces have been recorded here. In 1814 a stone coffin was found, during the making of the present lower road from Upton to Little Barrington,¹ about a mile to the west of Burford. Unfortunately the discovery was made before the days of modern scientific excavation ; and we know no more of it than is to be found in a communication made at the time by the Hon. and Rev. Francis Knollis, then Vicar of Burford :

On Monday the 21st of November, 1814, some workmen repairing a road on the estate of John Lenthall, Esq., on the West of Burford and about a mile from the town, discovered a large stone coffin about 3 feet below the surface of the earth, containing the skeleton of a human body. The coffin was covered by a lid of stone, exactly fitted to it, with a rim or ledge, upon which a cement of reddish colour had been introduced, so as to entirely shut out the air ; and the more effectually to secure the purpose, the sides of the lid were covered with blue clay, brought from some distance, no clay being found near this spot. The bones appeared extended as the body lay—most of them entire, the large ones quite so—and are firm and perfect ; the skull is also unimpaired, and the teeth not in the least decayed, but fixed in each jaw unimpaired. The only thing in the coffin besides the bones, and some particles of a dusty substance, were a number of small iron studs, the heads rounded, and appear to have been fixed in a substance similar to leather, some of the points being near an inch in length ; they were set very close together, and might perhaps have been worn as a defence, not unlike a Roman Lorica. There was no weapon of any kind, or any inscription to be found. The coffin is formed of an entire block of freestone, which is found in quarries not far distant. It is neatly worked, both in the excavation and on the outside. The cavity is 6 feet in length, 21 inches deep at the head, 16 inches at the feet, gradually declining ; the breadth over the breast is 2 feet 2 inches, and at the feet contracted to 4 inches. The whole height from the ground (excluding the lid or cover, about 5 inches thick) is 2 feet 11 inches. The right side is quite straight, but the left curved. It was fixed in the ground with the feet almost pointing due south. The field where it was discovered is open, and no house or burial ground is supposed to be near it. The coffin weighs 16 cwt. The perfect state, from the exclusion of the air, in which the bones are preserved renders it a matter of great curiosity to form a reasonable judgement.

It used to be popularly supposed that this coffin, which is now in the churchyard, was a relic of the battle here in A.D. 752 between the Mercians and the West Saxons. But

Mr. Reginald Smith, of the British Museum, upon seeing the coffin, pronounced it Roman. Of the fate of the contents of the coffin nothing is now known.

It is remarkable that no other Roman remains, except a few coins, should have been found at Burford. For Akeman Street must have passed, at its nearest point, not much more than a couple of miles to the south-east of the town; and both at Asthall, about four miles distant, where Akeman Street crosses the river, and at Widford, only a mile and a half distant, there are considerable signs of Roman settlement. But in both these cases the Romans had sites on the other side of the river with a southward-facing aspect. Burford, on its northward-facing slope, would offer a less attractive position.

The developments of the early settlement may be discerned, as we approach the Anglo-Saxon period, from the place-name which it then acquired. Evidently the ford over the river had come into use; and that, in turn, means that new lines of movement were being followed. During the Roman occupation, with Akeman Street crossing the river four miles to the east,¹ and the Fosse Way marching over the high ground above the head-waters some ten miles to the west, Burford had remained off the main currents of movement. The fact that it was now named from the ford shows that a new channel of communication was in use. Since it provided a straight way from the northern and north-eastern Cotswolds to the upper—and easier—crossings of the Thames, it must have been a frequented route.

To this situation Burford owes its place in Anglo-Saxon records. One of the references to it at this period is of such doubtful authenticity that it had better be left out of account—the one, namely, which alleges the holding of a Synod here in A.D. 685.² The other reference, however, is open to no such doubt. It is the account in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle of a battle fought here in A.D. 752.

In this year Cuthred King of the West Saxons in the twelfth year of his reign fought at Burford against Aethelbald King of the Mercians and put him to flight.¹

Later chroniclers expand this brief statement with some picturesqueness of detail. The version in Richard of Cirencester, which is almost word for word identical with that in Matthew of Paris, is as follows :

Hathellardo rege Occidentalium Saxonum defuncto, regnavit pro eo frater eius Cuthredus quindecim annis. Hic vero Cuthredus adversus Ethelbaldum regem Merciorum et Britones iugi exercitio victorias adipiscens non minimum sudoris consumpsit. Nam Cuthredus praedictus cum regis Merciorum Ethelbaldi superbas exactiones et insolentias ferre non posset, occurrit ei hostiliter apud Beoreforde, ubi praelium gravissimum dicti reges commiserunt. Ethelbaldus vero, praecedente Ethelmo cum vexillo eius, in quo erat aureus draco depictus, acriter ruit in hostes, sed vexillifer regis Cuthredi in hostilem vexilliferum lanceam dirigens perforavit eum. Unde clamore elato pars Cuthredi regis valde confortata est. Tonitruum ergo belli et sonitus ictuum clamoresque hinc inde cadentium terribiliter personarunt. Spes enim mutuo victoriae certa memoria fugae nulla. Sed Deus tandem qui superbis resistit et humilibus dat gratiam, Ethelbaldum in fugam compulit, et laeta Cuthredo victoria provenit.²

Henry of Huntingdon expands the account a little more :

Cudredus decimo tertio anno, cum iam regis Edelbaldi superbas exactiones et insolentiam ferre non posset, occurrit ei cum legionibus vexillatis apud Bereford, omni spe vivendi postposita libertati. Adduxit autem secum Edelhun praedictum consulem, iam sibi concordem, cuius viribus fretus et consilio, belli discrimen ingredi potuit. Edelbaldus vero rex regum cum Mercensibus Centenses adduxerat, Orientalesque Saxones et Anglos, copiasque multiplices. Aciebus igitur dispositis cum in directum tendentes appropinquarent, Edelhun praecedens Westsexenses, regis insigne draconem scilicet aureum gerens, transforavit vexilliferum hostilem.

Unde clamore orto, pars Cudredi valde confortata est; statimque acies sibi invicem offenderunt. Ergo tonitruum belli, scilicet offensionis armorum et sonitus ictuum clamorisque cadentium, terribiliter exarsit, bellum maximum et inaestimabile incipitur: quod vel Mercenses, vel eos Westsexe, usque in longam posteritatem vincenti supponeret. Videres igitur acies loriceis crispantes, galeis acutas, lanceis hirsutas, vexillis depictas, auro resplendentes, parvo tempore sanguine perfusas, lanceis cassas, ruina dissipatas, cerebris asperas, visu horrendas. Congregantes autem se ad vexilla utrinque procaces et fortissimi, gladiis et securibus Amazonicis rem agentes, acies aciebus funeste irruerant. Memoria fugae nulla, spes victoriae utrinque certa: Mercenses superbiae tumor invitabat, Westsexas servitutis horror accendebat. At ubicunque consul praedictus aciebus se infligebat, via ruinarum patebat, dum securis eius timidissima, modo fulminis, corpora findebat et arma. Rex fortissimus autem Edelbaldus quacunque ruebat, strages hostilis fiebat, dum gladio eius invictissimo essent arma pro veste, ossa pro carne. Cum igitur, quasi duo ignes diversis in partibus impositi obstantia quaecunque consumerent, contigit ut sibi obviam rex et consul venirent. Uterque vero alteri terribilis corpore infrenduit, dextram excussit, se in armis collegit, et ictibus immensis arma obstantissima pares lacerant. Deus autem, qui superbis resistit, a quo robur fortitudo et magnanimitas procedit, gratiae suae regi Edelbaldo terminum posuit, animoque regis confidentiam solitam dempsit. Cum igitur nec animum suum nec vires ipse recognosceret, pugnantibus adhuc suis, a Domino omnipotenti territus, fugam primus incepit. Nec ab hac die usque ad mortis suae tempora prosperum aliquid ei Deus permisit.¹

It is clear from these accounts that Burford lay upon a well-known and customary line of the travelling of that period. Neither army was at Burford to begin with; they were moving towards one another, when they met here, and the line of march must, from their use of it at this juncture, have been one of the best to take in moving from Wessex into Mercia, or from Mercia into Wessex.

The name of Battle Edge, by which a piece of land on the slope of the hill west of the town is known, is supposed to mark the site of the battle; and Camden relates that in his day the Burford people used to 'make up a dragon and giant, and carry them about in procession' on Midsummer Eve,¹ in allusion to the standard borne (whether on Ethelbald's side or on Cuthred's, for the Chroniclers do not agree upon this point²) in the fight.

On the strength of the records of this event, the derivation of the place-name of Burford has usually been given as Beorh-Ford, the Hill-Ford. In effect, this derivation depends on the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle alone. The later Chroniclers must have copied from that the form of the name, since at the period at which they were writing that form is never found in documents. The various MSS. of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle give the name as 'Georgeforda' (C.C.C. Camb.), 'Beorhforda' (Bodl. Laud 636; Brit. Mus. Cott. Tiber. A. 6, and B. 1), and 'Beorhforde' (Brit. Mus. Cott. Tiber. B. 4).

It may be difficult, in the face of this authority, to suggest any other derivation. Yet the later forms of the place-name are all against this one. In Domesday it appears as 'Bureford'; and that remains throughout the three succeeding centuries the almost invariable form, with occasional instances of the present form of 'Burford'. Now the Anglo-Saxon 'Beorh-' could not possibly modify naturally into 'Bure-'. The pronunciation of that word—and it is on the pronunciation of words, in those days of little writing, that our judgement must depend—would be more or less like our pronunciation of the word 'bear'. This would modify into 'Bere-', and ultimately produce, as in actual instances it has produced, a place-name 'Barford'. Amid many hundred written examples of the name of Burford the form 'Bereford' only occurs twice, and it never occurs at all in documents of local origin.

It is, therefore, not altogether a gratuitous complication of a subject at best obscure to offer an alternative derivation of the name from 'Burh-Ford', the ford with defensive enclosure. This would modify quite naturally into 'Bureford', and ultimately produce 'Burford'. The local dialect word which represents to this day the Anglo-Saxon 'Burh'—namely, 'Burry', meaning 'Sheltered' or 'Protected'¹—gives us precisely the pronunciation which would account for 'Bureford'. It is, of course, necessary, if this derivation is to be put forward, to suggest some reason for the appearance of the place as 'Beorhforda' in the Chronicle. But, bearing in mind the rarity of the written word in those times, and considering that the author of the Chronicle would no doubt have heard that the fighting took place on a hill above the river, it is not fantastic to suppose that his version was his own version, created to meet the need for a written form, and not that current in speech among the people of the place itself. All the evidence, as written documents increase in number, goes to show that in their minds it was from the burhs that the settlement took its name.

Derived in this way, it would be a far more distinctive name than the other derivation would give. Beorh-Ford would not be distinctive at all. Any ford over the Windrush from Minster Lovell upwards would be quite equally a Hill-Ford, both in the approach to it and in the passage up from it. But if, as the names of Bury Orchard and Bury Barns have already suggested, there were near this ford two burhs, the settlement at such a point might easily be distinguished by the name of the Burh-Ford.

The natural situation would certainly lead us to accept without surprise the existence of two burhs. For while the new trackways of the Anglo-Saxon period had made the ford a point requiring defence, the older way down the crest of the watershed remained, and would surely afford a reason for another defensive enclosure protecting a settlement situated, during the long struggles between Wessex and Mercia, upon very debatable ground. If there was such a work, Bury Barns, standing just at the point where the crest road and the road from the ford meet on the way to the Thames, is exactly where it might be expected to be placed. Bury Orchard, in its turn, occupies the most obvious ground for defending the ford (presuming that the latter was near the line of the present bridge), since it lies in a salient angle formed by the course of the river, from which the ford could be effectively enfiladed. In neither place are there any surviving traces of a burh; unless the noticeably square outline of some fields at Bury Barns, marked, moreover, along part of their sides by a narrow strip of rough ground carrying a belt of trees, be indication of an old defensive enclosure.

The small community recorded in Domesday was settled beside the river burh. This would be almost certain from the existence of the ancient church on the river's bank, the town mills a little higher up the stream, and the fact that, at the earliest dates at which grants of houses begin to define the situation of them, they are found to be more or less near the river. But it is rendered quite certain when we observe that the town of Burford, as we shall have occasion to remark later, was for a long period confined to the lower portion of the ground it covers to-day. FitzHamon's charter having been granted at some date within twenty years of Domesday, it is evident that the situation of the town it ultimately created must locate for us the Domesday community.

For their arable land, however, those who settled here had had to go to some distance. Close at hand they had only ground with a northward aspect. But at the top of the hill they found land with a good sunny aspect, sloping slightly towards the south as far as the Shil Brook, which was in the end to become, for a great part of its length, the boundary of the common field on that side, and of the ecclesiastical parish of Burford. Here, then, they cultivated their crops, using the ground that lay on both sides of the way leading over the hill to the Thames at Lechlade. This way made a natural division of the land into two parts, an East Field and a West Field; and throughout the history of Burford the common field cultivation remained on a two-field basis.

As time went on, and more land was needed, parts of the northward-facing slope adjoining to the original fields were put under cultivation. But these were reckoned as belonging to either the East or the West Field.¹

Thus the situation of the community here accords well with certain observed characteristics of the villages of this part of Oxfordshire. Dr. Warde Fowler, in his masterly piece of village history, Kingham Old and New,² writes: 'It is characteristic, not only of Kingham, but of almost all the villages round us, that the church stands at one extremity, while the houses straggle away in one or two streets towards the land which before the enclosures was the "open field". In the hams and tons of the valley, the church is usually at the end nearest the river, and the village has grown out in the direction of the slopes where the arable of the farms is for the most part situated.'

But, of course, that growth is of a later date. The Domesday community, comprising, apart from the demesne servi, some forty households, would find ample space on the level ground near the church. If it reached out at all, it would be more likely to have stretched along the level towards the valuable hay meadows, which lay to the east beside the river in the direction of the present Witney road. Grants of houses in Witney Street are found, in fact, as early as those of houses elsewhere in the town.

The river-side burh thus proving to be the one that dictated the site of the town, what was the destiny at this period of the hill-top burh? The answer is that, by all the evidence, it became the enclosure of the manor house. The history of the Burford manor house is obscure; and it is a singular fact that no house at the present day retains the tradition of being the manor house, nor for the past four hundred years does any document conveying the manor lands and the manorial rights mention a house. Its former situation, however, is not open to doubt.

Domesday places at Burford a mansio of considerable size.

Among the houses of manorial lords recorded at the opening of the Oxfordshire Survey is one here belonging to Earl Alberic. The entry reads :

Ad terras quas tenuit Albericus comes pertinent i ecclesia et iii mansiones Harum ii iacent ad ecclesiam S Marie reddentes xxviii denarios et tertia iacet ad Bureford reddens v solidos.

Now although it is impossible to arrive at any exact estimate of the comparative importance in the shire of this mansio, owing to the fact that the mansiones of most of the chief lords are entered simply by the total numbers and total value, not by the value of each separately, yet it is not difficult to deduce from the nature of those totals that the Burford mansio was at any rate one of the largest in the county.

It is, therefore, the more curious that the early Inquisitions Post Mortem, in the thirteenth century, make no mention of a house as among the possessions of the manor. Nor does any early Account Roll (though one for the years 1235-9 gives expenses of the manor for three successive years) record any payment for work done, either in repairs or new building, on the manor house. It is not until 1344, in connexion with the settlement of the manor made by the Hugh le Despenser of that date, that a house is again mentioned, the capitale messuagium then being entered at an annual value of 2s.

That is a considerable decline from the 5s. of Domesday. But, indeed, the circumstances of the manor would lead us to expect a decline. The great men who held it in chief, with their large territories and their castles, would never need for their own use the house of this small and remote manor. The thirteenth-century tenant by sub-infeudation, John Giffard, was also a man of wide possessions, from the Cotswolds to the Welsh Border, and would be as little likely to need a house here. It may well have sunk to being no more than a residence for the steward of the manor. That some life, at any rate, went on in it we may conclude from one small indication in the Account Roll of 1235-9, an entry of money spent on leeks and cabbages and salt ad potagium famulorum.¹

These famuli must have been the house servants of the manor house.

Such as it was, it stood at Bury Barns. Fairly good evidence of this is given by a couple of references in the Burford Records. In the Lay Subsidy list of 1316 is a Iohannes ad Aulam; and in the list of 1326-7, which distinguishes between the three members of the manor, Iohannes atte Halle appears among the Signett assessments.¹ More definite is the entry in the Edwardian Survey of a close called 'Hawllecrofte iacentem prope Burybarnes'.² But the final proof is to be drawn from the later history of the manor. When at length the agricultural portion begins to be entered in documents under a name of its own, to distinguish it from the chartered borough, the name given to it was 'the manor of Bury Barns alias Burford'.³ Obviously that name would not be chosen at random; it would almost certainly represent the seat of the manorial court to which the tenants of this portion owed suit; and thus it might be advanced by itself as proof of the site of the manor house. The matter is put beyond doubt by the Deeds of Sale of the town and manor in the seventeenth century. Tanfield, Falkland, and the Lenthalls were lords of the manor. But the only manorial property conveyed in these Deeds, besides the lordship of the town, is Bury Barns. That must, therefore, on all these grounds, have been the old manor house, occupying the position of the hill-top burh.

Little use though its lords may have made of it, it had kings of England under its roof more than once in these early centuries. The first Royal visitor of whom we have record is Stephen, who tested at Burford two charters to the Monastery of Gloucester.⁴ His visit may best be dated between 1147 and 1150. For, considering the relations between Stephen and Robert of Gloucester, it is not very likely that a grant to Gloucester by the former would have been made before

³ Part III, p. 624.

⁴ History and Cartulary of the Monastery of St. Peter of Gloucester (Rolls Series, 1865), vol. ii, pp. 108, 176. The two charters have the same witnesses, so there is no reason to suppose that Stephen was here more than once.

Robert's death in 1147; nor, it may be added, very likely that before that event Stephen would have been staying on one of Robert's manors, when there was the royal domain of Wychwood close at hand.

The next king whom we know to have been here was King John. Whether he was ever here during the early years of his reign, when he actually held the manor, cannot be said. It is difficult to think that he was not, coming so often as he did to Oxford, where he seems to have been particularly fond of spending Christmas. But the only definite record of his being here occurs quite at the end of his life. It was on September 2, 1216, on his way from Cirencester, where he had been the day before, to Oxford; and he only stayed for a single night. That was little more than a month before his death; and it can hardly have been a joyous Court that the Burford folk saw gathered then round the bitter King.

Before the century closed another king visited the place, Edward I. A writ of his is dated here 1291; and he too was only here for a single night. It may be added here that Edward III was in Burford in 1329, and Richard II in 1399.¹

Of the topography of Burford during the two centuries after Domesday we have very little information. The two mills can be placed. In the sixteenth century there is a grant by the Crown of 'two corn mills built under one roof called Burford Mills'; and we find later that mills near the bridge were called the Port Mills.² That name is enough to justify the conclusion that these were the mills of Domesday; and there need be no hesitation in identifying them with the two mills under one roof of the sixteenth-century grant.

We know also that the Hospital was in existence before 1226;³ and can thus identify another occupied site. But the references during these centuries to houses do not specify their situation. At some date before 1107 two houses here were given to the Abbey of Tewkesbury by 'Ralph the Priest'; and at some date before 1205 two burgages were given to Bruern Abbey by a man with an extraordinary name, 'ex dono Lowinilapis'.¹ Both the abbeys must have sold these houses, since neither of them held property in Burford at the time of the Dissolution; and thus we are deprived of any chance of identifying the houses.

In 1200 two messuages and a half are mentioned in a case brought by 'Willelmus Clericus de Bureford' and Richard son of Simon against William of Upton and his wife Paulina, concerning a division of property.² In 1193 it appears from another partition of property that Thomas de Langley, who was Warden of Wychwood Forest, held five messuages in the town.

The single identification that can be made during this period is of a house granted to the Priory of Cold Norton circa 1250.³ From later grants, and from the fact that it ultimately became one of the houses held here by Brasenose College, the house can be placed at the southern corner of Lawrence Lane and the High Street, on the site of what was later the King's Head Inn.⁴

Although that is the only scrap of topographical detail among these references, the others are not without some interest. The half-messuage, for instance, is an indication of increasing population; it shows that the original buildings of the burghal tenants were beginning to be subdivided, in order to accommodate new inhabitants unable to pay a full burgage rent.

It is interesting also to observe that, even at this early date, one effect of the granting of charters, and of the consequent tenure of houses at a money rent with right of disposal by will, was the accumulation of house property as a form of wealth. Ralph the Priest had two houses; William the cleric and the other parties in 1199 dispute about two and a half houses, which must have been a single holding, since there is question of division between two parties; Thomas de Langley held five. Evidently the burgage tenure was already producing a class of landlords, holding several of the messuages at the small burgage rent, and sub-letting them to occupiers.

This deduction becomes of some importance in connexion with estimating the population of the town at later dates in these two centuries. The first facts that we have to rely on, after the date of Domesday, are contained in the Inquisition Post Mortem of 1299. In this the 'free tenants' are entered as numbering 105. But if the burgages were in some instances grouped in single ownerships, this figure may need some modification before reckoning from it the probable total population. However, a reference of later date shows that the precaution is hardly necessary. The Survey of 6 Edward VI gives at that date only 124 full burgages in the town. There would certainly not be more than this in 1299. The conclusion therefore must be either that the accumulation of several burgages in single hands had not proceeded far; or that in this Inquisition it is of no account, the 'free tenants' being the occupiers. In the latter case, which is the more likely, the population of the town in 1299 may be put at about 500.¹

That was not the total population of the manor, for the hamlets of Signett and Upton appear separately. In the former there were twelve villeins holding a full virgate, and three holding a half virgate, which gives fifteen households and some seventy-five inhabitants. They already held at a money rent in lieu of services, the rent for a full virgate, entered as twenty acres, being 12s. 6½d., and for a half virgate of ten acres 6s. 3½d. At Upton there were eight customary tenants, which would add forty persons to the total population, the whole manor of Burford thus containing by estimation about 600 people. The customary tenants of Upton were still on the old terms of tenure. A money value of their services is, indeed, entered; but in such a manner as to leave it more probable that they were not yet actually in the position of paying a money rent.

Evidence of the state of the population for the next two hundred years is very scanty. The Lay Subsidy Rolls for 1316 and 1326-7 give lists of the persons assessed here to the tax; but no later Rolls give similar lists until the Subsidy of 1524. At the same time another source of information is removed by the fact that in 1344 Hugh le Despenser and in 1459 Isabella, Countess of Warwick, made settlements of the manor of Burford (among other of their lands) to feoffees in trust for their heirs, so that Inquisitions Post Mortem no longer give details of the manor. Consequently from 1344 until well into the sixteenth century practically no estimate of the population can be made.

Hence we are unable to see with any certainty the effects in Burford of that event which is so terribly important in relation to the population of England at this period, namely, the Black Death. All that we have to go upon points to the rather strange conclusion that some such heavy blow as fell on the rest of the country in 1348 had fallen here some time before 1344. In the Inquisition of that year concerning Hugh le Despenser's request for licence to alienate the manor to trustees for his heirs the total rental of the 'liberi et nativi tenentes' of the manor is entered at £14 10s. Now if we put together the rents of the borough tenants and those of the agricultural hamlets entered in earlier Inquisitions, we find that in 1295-9 they amounted to £35 0s. 11½d., and in 1307 to £37 1s. 0d. The same extraordinary decline is visible if we take the total value of all the assets of the manor. In 1261 these amounted to £61 19s. 1d.; in 1295-9 to £55 16s. 0½d.; in 1307 to £62 16s. 2d.; and in 1344 to no more than £19 16s. 4d.

Such evidence as can be gathered from the totals of Lay Subsidies is very similar in effect. The total of a Subsidy of a twentieth in 1326-7 was £11 8s. 9d.; the total of a Subsidy of a tenth and a fifteenth, which should have produced at least three times as much, in 1347 was only £19 12s. 4d. Again, the decline occurs before the date of the Black Death. No conclusion seems to be possible except that Burford had been ravaged by some epidemic before 1344—perhaps a minor incursion of the same plague. When the culminating horror came, the place suffered again. A tenth and fifteenth in 1383-4 produced only £14 1s. 4d., or £5 10s. less than even in 1347, though thirty-five years had intervened for recovery from the plague.

A few points of general interest arise from an analysis of the Subsidy Lists of 1316 and 1326-7. In the latter case separate lists are given for Burford, Upton, and Signett. The earlier list makes no distinction of this kind; but, by comparison with the later one, we find that it contains 37 Burford names, 13 Upton names, and 8 Signett names. In 1326-7 there are 48 names under Burford, 20 under Upton, and 14 under Signett.¹

It is evident that the later figures are the more instructive; the increase under each heading shows that there had been a stricter enumeration for assessment, and therefore a better representation of the population. Taking those figures, then, the first thing that strikes us is the increase in the population of Upton. Instead of the eight tenants of 1295 (seven in 1307), there are now twenty men of substance. This is an interesting reflection of the changes in the manorial system which were making the tenure of land less onerous, especially the substitution of money rents for services. Signett, where money rents were in operation in 1299, shows no increase in 1326-7. Upton, where the tenants were on the old service tenure in 1295 and 1307, has, since the latter date, trebled its population; the change to money rents must have taken place there. The inducement to live in the town, which the burghal tenure offered, had disappeared.

Two other conclusions which emerge from the lists are, first, that even leaving the burghal tenants at the same number as in 1299, less than half of them were of sufficient substance to be taxed on their movable goods; and secondly, that comparison of the amounts paid by individuals in the town and in the two hamlets shows that the people of the borough were on much the same level of assessments as the people of the agricultural settlements. These facts, in conjunction with an inability to deduce any increase of the town population, can only mean that the Market and Gild privileges had not as yet brought much prosperity to the town.

This deduction, bearing in mind the circumstances of the time, becomes of importance in any attempt to reconstruct the general life of Burford in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. For we are already well into the famous Cotswold wool period; yet the Subsidy lists show us no individual or individuals of outstanding wealth. There are certain levels of assessment, to which the inhabitants of substance conform, to such a degree that regular classification would not be impossible; and all would come into one or the other class. No one is markedly better off than others who could be ranked as of the same assessment class.

The truth is, as this would lead us to expect, that the more magnificent aspect of the Cotswold trade, the wholesale dealing of the woolmen, is seen but rarely in the Burford Records. It appears occasionally, as in the licence granted in 1273 to Lambert le Fraunceis to export twenty sacks of wool; and in the Chancery cases arising out of the deals in which John Pynnok and Thomas Stanton were concerned at the end of the fifteenth century. But they are usually small affairs; Pynnok's was a matter of £92, Stanton's of £68.¹

The business of Burford was rather in occupations subsidiary to the wool trade. These are constantly met with, as in the mention of drapers in 1250,² 1375,³ and 1404,⁴ a shearman in 1461,⁵ tailors in 1316 and 1327,⁶ dyers and weavers, and an individual described as 'le Napper',⁷ which probably indicates the occupation otherwise known as fulling—the raising of the nap on cloth. Moreover, wealthier men, when described, are clothiers, dealers in the manufactured product, not woolmen.

No reason can be given for this, unless it be that the situation of the town on a river, convenient for washing and dyeing cloth and for the erection of fulling-mills, inclined the inhabitants to woollen manufacture rather than to the production of the raw article. It is, of course, possible—and indeed likely, in view of the adornment of the Church—that some of the richer citizens of the fifteenth century, of whose occupations we have no record, were more or less regular woolmen. But Burford has no one to reckon among the great Staplers.

Thus we must see the place as engaged in woollen manufacturers and general trade. Of its mercantile life we can gather a very fair picture from the Records. Tradesmen whose occupations are mentioned (other than those just given) are a tanner,¹ some bakers,² a brewer,³ an ironmonger,⁴ a glover,⁵ a slater,⁶ some spicers (or, as we should now say, grocers),⁷ butchers,⁸ chandlers,⁹ a cook-shop keeper,¹⁰ and a nail-maker.¹¹ The description 'merchant', which is applied to several townsmen late in the fifteenth century, needs to be interpreted with some caution.¹² In one instance a man is described as 'merchant alias mercer', which shows that the term does not necessarily imply any very large business dealings.

But the best idea of the trade of the place is to be derived from the Letters Patent of Edward II, establishing the Bridge tolls in 1322.¹³ All sorts of live stock came to market, horses, cattle, pigs, sheep, and goats; hides of horses and oxen both fresh and tanned, fleeces of sheep, skins of goats, of deer of several kinds, of rabbits, hares, foxes, rats, and squirrels; fresh and salt meat and bacon; fresh and salt salmon, mullets, conger eels and fresh-water eels, stock-fish (or salt cod), and—an interesting item—'fish of Aberdeen', which, mentioned as it is in conjunction with stock-fish, shows that red herrings were an Aberdeen export six hundred years ago. Various kinds of woven stuffs came in for sale, as samite, diaper, and baudekyn cloth, silk fabrics with and without gold embroidery, linen, and cloths of Galway and worsted. Wine and cider are mentioned, oil, honey, cheese, butter, salt, peas and beans; as also verdigris and certain unguents. Iron, lead, copper and tin, horse-shoes, cart-wheel tires, large and small nails, and brazing materials were to be had in the market ; and so were wood, coal, turf, and faggots.

When increasing use and more careful preservation of written documents begin to reveal more of the topography of Burford, the extent of the town becomes apparent. Until well into the sixteenth century it did not reach up the steeper part of the hill. It formed, roughly speaking, a square between the river on the north and the line of Sheep Street and Witney Street on the south, the Priory on the west and the further end of Witney Street on the east. For thus limiting the mediaeval Burford there are several reasons. One is that no documents of this period refer to any houses in what is now the upper part of the town. Moreover, when houses in that direction do begin to occur, in the later sixteenth century, they are described as lying, not in the High Street simply, but as ' in the High Street on the hill ', or sometimes merely ' on the hill '.¹ Clearly, therefore, they were in a place which, not having been hitherto commonly mentioned in documents, had to be specially defined. Finally, it is to be noticed that more than once the early descriptions of houses employ a form of phrase which could not have arisen if the town had had its present shape. A grant of 1413 speaks of a house standing about where the Grammar School stands to-day as being ' in the eastern part of Burford '.² A house in that position could only be described to-day as in the northern part. But in a town not of greater extent from north to south than from east to west, the part near the Church would be the eastern part. Similarly there are descriptions of houses near the Priory, which we should equally regard as in the northern area of the town, as ' in the western part '. The High Street then divided the place into halves.

Within this square, the plan of the streets was exactly as it is to-day. The High Street, Witney Street, Sheep Street, and both the lanes leading to the Church are mentioned. The modern names of these two lanes, however, are not found. They are called, as a rule, the upper lane, and the lower lane, leading to the Church. But the latter has, in one deed of 1493, the queer name of Bordemwetlane—queer, but, on a superficial view, probably descriptive of its normal condition. References to Church Green and Guildenford Lane are frequent. The street leading to the Priory was called St. John's Street; and Priory Lane, which has now extended its name to this street, was only the narrow way leading up behind the present Lamb Inn. Both sides of Sheep Street and both sides of Witney Street were built upon, but not to the full length of the modern streets in either case. The end of Sheep Street on the south side is described in the sixteenth century as newly built upon;¹ and a description of some premises in Witney Street in 1423 as situated in 'le Newelond'² implies that at that date fresh ground was being occupied there.

Grants of houses at this time so invariably specify their situation that a rather more detailed picture can be attempted. The Vicarage stood where it does now, since an early deed concerning houses on the site of Cob Hall speaks of them as standing between the Vicarage and the river. A little higher up was a house belonging to the Abbey of Keynsham, and somewhere near the corner of the road leading to the Priory was a forge. On the opposite side of the High Street, the ground between the two lanes to the Church was occupied by a group of houses and gardens, a small pasture-close, and a stable. The corner house on Lawrence Lane was the one already mentioned as belonging to the Priory of Cold Norton. Next to it in Lawrence Lane were a house and garden belonging to Thomas Spicer, and then came the pasture-close with the stable at its edge, curving round by the churchyard much as the Grammar School site curves round to-day. At the Grammar School corner stood another house, and next to it in Church Lane a cottage and a bake-house. Between this and the High Street came a garden with another house. On the other side of Church Lane was a garden, as there is to-day, and a large house towards the High Street end called Broadgates. The site of the Almshouses, until their erection, was open, consisting of two pasture-closes; but there was a house on the site of the present Church School next the churchyard, the tenement of one John Bavork, from whom the site was for a long time known as 'Bavorks'.

Returning to the High Street, the first spot above Church Lane on the eastern side which we can determine is the Cock Row, not far below the Witney Street corner; it has now been cleared away, but a gap in the line of houses shows where it was. At the upper corner of Witney Street the house on the turning and the house next to it, now the Bull, are mentioned. On the other side of the High Street the most easily identified house is the Novum Hospitium Angulare, which stood at the Sheep Street corner on ground now occupied by two houses.¹ The only shop of the period definitely mentioned as such was beside the George archway, on the south of it. Lower down on that side, behind the houses in the angle formed by the High Street and the road to the Priory, lay an open space called Salmon's Close.

In Witney Street two houses east of the Bull back gate, in one of which a fifteenth-century doorway could quite lately be seen, are mentioned. So is the barn opposite that back gate, which stood then, as it does now, at the corner of an opening from the street; at that time, however, the opening led through into the High Street by way of the Cock Row. The further end of the street gave upon small enclosed fields, much as it does to-day.

In Sheep Street the Gild of the town had a tenement, standing apparently in rather extensive grounds, about the middle of the south side of the street. At the further end on that side the street was open to a pasture-close with a dove-cot on it, which gave it the name of the Culverhey. The site of the present Bank house was occupied by a house with a garden, which, judging by later mentions of it, must have been a good-sized messuage.

Several closes and garden grounds not attached to houses are mentioned. The area of mediaeval Burford would easily accommodate all the houses we need allow for, and yet leave space for a good many open plots. At present there are within the limits given some one hundred and seventy houses, and a great deal of garden space behind them; so that one hundred and twenty burgages or so would not have crowded the ground. But many of the closes were on the steep hill above the inhabited space. On the west side of the hill they belonged chiefly to the demesne land of the manor;¹ but on the east side also was a succession of small enclosures reaching out along the slopes as far as the houses reached in Witney Street, and these would account for a good many of the pasture-closes mentioned.

The manor house, standing at the top of this open rise of the hill, comes at last more definitely into Burford history in 1428. In that year the demesne was leased at farm to Robert Atkyns for three lives, a tenancy that would run through a great part of the rest of the century. There is, of course, no certainty that this was the first tenant occupation of the place, but it is the first of which we have record. Atkyns held the whole of the manor land; and we may attribute conjecturally to this date the fine cruciform barn still existing at Bury Barns; it has all the characteristics of a fifteenth-century structure of this class. It is possible also that some remains of old building at the back of the present dwelling-house are of this period; and if so, it will hardly be too much to suggest that Atkyns's tenancy marks a new stage in the history of the manorial domain, the lands being no longer kept in hand, under the management of a steward, but leased out in a way which would be very likely to cause the buildings to be improved for the tenant's residence.

The town of Burford, thus planned, would have presented not only a smaller, but also a much humbler, appearance than the town of to-day. For the houses up to the end of the fifteenth century must have been very largely of wooden construction. In some cases there would be a lower storey of stone, with an upper storey of timber and plaster. But the majority must have been built throughout of wattle and daub between timber uprights based on a low plinth of two or three courses of stonework. The extent to which timber entered into house-building here, even as late as the fifteenth century, is shown by a clause in the lease of a house in Witney Street, dated 1404, by which the tenant is allowed, subject to the advice of the lessors, to cut down trees on the premises for repairing the house.¹ But it is shown more conclusively by the fact that there is no mention of quarries in any of the manorial documents until 1435. There cannot, therefore, have been any considerable demand for building-stone until, at any rate, the latter part of the fourteenth century; if there had been, quarries, as a valuable manorial asset, would have been sought for in a stone country like this, and opened at an earlier date.

Three are entered on the manorial Account Roll of 1435-6.² One was a freestone quarry called Whiteladies Quarry; the two others, of slating stone, were called Sterte Quarry and Le Wort Quarry. All three appear again in the Survey of 6 Edward VI, the first as Whichelate Quarry, Sterte under the same name, and the third as 'le Slatte quarry lying in Signett'. With this information they can all be identified. The ground called Sturt is in the extreme south-east part of Burford parish, and the site of an old quarry can be seen there. The only old freestone quarry in the place is the one now called Upton Quarry, which later supplied stone for the building of Christ Church, Oxford, and for the rebuilding of St. Paul's Cathedral in London. The reference to the remaining quarry as lying in Signett identifies Le Wort as the old quarry pit on the east of the Lechlade road about a mile from the town.

The fact that the only freestone quarry was at later dates supplying stone for great buildings elsewhere is proof that it had not been very heavily worked for building in Burford. This supports the view that, even when stone began to be more freely used, it was not as a rule employed above the ground-floor storey, the upper parts of the houses being still of timber with wattle and daub filling.¹

That would account for a certain architectural incongruity which must have puzzled many observers in Burford, namely, the existence of fine old pointed archways in what are now insignificant positions. These, it has been remarked by a distinguished architect, are the entrance doorways of the larger type of burgage houses here.² Nowadays they open only into narrow yards, or else into little alleys of cottages; while nothing in the buildings in which they are set is of an impressive character. The explanation, given the nature of the original houses, is not difficult to provide. The archways stood in the centre of the house frontages, with living rooms on either side and above, and led through the buildings to the gardens, closes, barns, wool-sheds, and workshops of their owners. Now, as increasing population necessitated division of the burgage tenements, a house of this kind offered itself peculiarly to the purpose. The entrances under the archway to either side of the original house would instantly facilitate division into two separate dwellings. At the same time ease of access through the archway to ground at the back would facilitate the building of rows of cottages there, on the courtyard or close. Once the tenement had been thus dealt with, the timber and plaster upper storey would, in later times when stone was more freely used, be very easily destroyed, and very likely to be destroyed, to make way for new ideas and a more complete partition of the building. It can be seen in this way how nothing of the original structure would remain except the arch; and how, by the very nature of the case, the arch would survive amid a number of small houses having nothing in common with its own character.

These entries, then, together with the few remaining

¹ This in turn gives yet another proof that the mediaeval town lay within the limits we have set for it. A great number of houses there, though plastered surfaces disguise the construction, have the upper stories of this ancient character; whereas only two or three houses on the hill are so built.

PLATE IX. EARLY SEVENTEENTH-CENTURY
HOUSE IN HIGH STREET

specimens of timber and wattle work in ground-floor storeys,¹ are some of the oldest survivals of domestic architecture which can be definitely indicated in Burford. Others of the same type, escaping the first subdivisions only to be more radically altered and rebuilt later on, must have perished without leaving even an archway. But, as these would be the most important houses of the town, they cannot have been very numerous. The smaller burgage house, such as the one in the High Street of which we have the dimensions in 1403²—20 feet long and 23 feet deep—would not have room for this kind of arched entrance.

One other architectural feature of Burford may be noted in connexion with the documents of this period. A grant of 1404 gives the dimensions of a shop in the High Street.³ It was 17½ feet long, 7 feet broad, and 7 feet high. The curiously shallow depth, taken in conjunction with the separate sale of the shop, without a tenement, indicates that the shop cannot have been an entirely separate structure, and yet was not part of a house proper. But being sold thus it must have had some permanence of building. If, as seems therefore likely, it was a kind of lean-to erection against the front of a house, it may be suggested that the stone-slatted pent-houses, which are a feature of several frontages in the High Street, represent the very early Burford shops. Most of them are now more or less disguised by the throwing out under them of bay-windows to the ground-floor rooms of the houses behind them. But the dimensions of one or two which remain partly open can be seen at a glance to correspond fairly well with those recorded in the grant of 1404. Originally they would be mere shelters on wooden uprights, just wide enough to protect a counter for the display of a tradesman's goods, the mediaeval house being so badly lighted that it would be necessary to bring the goods out of doors on a market day.

These glimpses of the ancient town can be completed

³ Part III, p. 333.

from the documents with some information as to the common arable fields. A terrier of the Rectory and glebe lands in 1501¹ gives indications which allow us to delimit roughly the extent of the fields at the end of the fourteenth century; and also to see how widely cultivation had expanded by that time. The Inquisition of 1299 enters as manorial tenants twelve virgaters and three half-virgaters, and puts the virgate at twenty acres.² In 1300, therefore, the extent of the East and West Fields would be about 270 acres each; which implies that the Fields barely reached to Signett on the south, and did not reach beyond the Shilton road on the east and the Westwell road on the west. By 1500 most, if not all, of the land within the parish boundaries south of the Witney-Northleach road was under cultivation, and the open fields had thus reached almost their fullest extent. For furlongs are recorded abutting upon Westwell Way, upon White Hill and a hedge near there, and upon both sides of Bampton Way.³ Now White Hill and the hedge take us quite to the eastern boundary of the parish. Bampton Way cannot be the modern Bampton road, which is altogether outside the parish, but must be the footpath from Signett across to the Shilton road and thence into the Bampton road near Stonelands; the reference to both sides of it gives us as our southern limit the Shil Brook, again the parish boundary. The western limit is not so clear. The only furlongs naming the Westwell road lay east of it. But it is curious that the terrier speaks of furlongs on this side of the common lands as lying in 'the East-West field', not

¹ John Thorpe records in 'The Book of the Vicaridge Rights' (see p. 137) that on a certain occasion he saw John Pryor carry off from a house in Burford a terrier of the Rectory lands. Can this be the identical terrier? Thorpe says he thinks it was written by Symon Randolph, Town Clerk at that time; and if so obviously this is not the one. But Thorpe may have been mistaken, and the fact that this terrier is now in the Bodleian Library with other diocesan documents suggests that it passed into the Bishop's hands with the rest of the Rectory property. It is a tempting addition that the family of Pryor were certainly living in the early eighteenth century in the Rectory house. The terrier will be found transcribed in full on pp. 673-680, the West Field'. It may be conjectured from this formula that the fields did by this time extend beyond the Westwell road, and that, as this road made so marked a division, the West Field had come to be regarded as in two parts, of which the older portion (in which Rectory and glebe lands would be likely to lie) was called, for the sake of clearness, the 'eastern west field'. If that is so, the Burford Fields on this side also had reached their full extent;¹ though not the parish boundary, Upton Fields intervening in that direction. At the White Hill end it is doubtful whether any land had yet been taken into cultivation north of the road along the ridge; the only named furlongs abutting on this road lay south of it; but at the other end the Fields stretched across this road and already came down to the end of Sheep Street. It may be added that the terrier shows that the manor demesne was by the East Field, between the present Lechlade and Shilton roads; the Lechlade road was at this time known as Dean-acre (or Denacre or Dynacre) Way.

³ See the maps of the fields on pp. 194 and 227.

In the East Field we have nineteen furlongs named: Hen furlong, Brodhedden furlong, Bampton Way furlong, the furlong over Bampton Way, Coppedslade furlong, Bellam (or Beldam) furlong, Ridgway furlong, Esterhen furlong, Westerhen furlong, Offley furlong, Sawnfyfe furlong, Whitston furlong, Cornfast furlong, Down furlong, Hedsondye furlong, Stertwell furlong, Uphed furlong, Hiote, and Monsty furlong. In the West Field twenty are named: Cheyney furlong, Clay furlong, Denacre furlong, Cleyt furlong, Westwell Way East furlong, Long furlong, Middle furlong, North furlong, Fuldenslade, the Worthy, Old Hill furlong, the Gorse, Fulden Hill furlong, Hillslade, Short furlong, Brighthill furlong, Ridgway furlong, Ferny furlong, Whitslade furlong, and Elerstub furlong.²

² Mr. St. Clair Baddeley has kindly suggested explanations of some of these curious names. 'Brodhedden' may, he thinks, be 'Broad Headland', and 'Hedsondye', 'Sandy Headland'. 'Fulden' may be 'Foul Deane', a muddy hollow. 'Coppedslade' is explained by its abutting upon 'Copped Cross', a ridged cross-roads, perhaps the point where the path to Bampton crosses the Shilton road on a rise of ground. 'Hiote'

Upton had its own arable fields farther to the west. They appear to have lain at this time in a square of which the eastern boundary was a roadway turning out of the Witney-Northleach road a little to the east of the Cirencester turning and running straight towards Westwell, and the western boundary was the boundary of Burford Parish, while the southern boundary corresponded with the line through Signett and the northern was the Witney-Northleach road. This square is divided into two triangular halves by the Cirencester road running diagonally across it; and each half contained about 250 acres at the Enclosure. This, while more than enough to accommodate the seven virgaters and one half-virgater of 1307, is too little for the twenty inhabitants of Upton on the Lay Subsidy of 1326-7.¹ We must therefore suppose that in this case the land on the northward face of the hill, across the Witney-Northleach road and towards the lower road to Little Barrington, which was included in Upton Fields at the time of the Enclosure, had already been taken into cultivation to accommodate the new tenants brought to Upton by the substitution of money rents for services. That gives a total area, at the Enclosure, of over 800 acres; which, at twenty acres to the virgate, would exactly correspond to the holdings of twenty virgaters.²

may be 'High Yate', a furlong near a gate on a rise of ground, or 'Hey Gate', the gate in a hedge. 'Monsty' may be 'mossy'. 'Uphe'd' may again be named from the headland, and be 'Upper Headland'. 'Cleyt' may mean clayey (Mr. Baddeley compares the dialect word 'clitty', for ground that cakes); but it is odd that there should have been a 'Clay' furlong also. 'The Worthy' is clearly named from 'Worth', a farm or dwelling, which would perhaps place this furlong near Signett. 'Stertwell' is placed by the surviving name of Sturt Farm; the meaning, a tail or tongue of land, implies an outlying piece of ground. 'Elerstub' I take to be 'Elder-tree Stump'.

² In the 1552 Survey the two Upton Fields are not, as in the Burford Fields, an East and a West Field, but a North and a South Field. This agrees with the natural divisions by old roads, both in the case of the small original square and the larger later area.

period as 'commune pratum', without any name; but it can be seen, by comparing early gifts of meadow land to the Church with later lists of the Church lands, that the meadow was that known later as High Mead. It has already been described as lying to the east of the town, along the line of the Witney road close to the river. It was a lot meadow of the usual type, since a gift of meadow land in 1396 contains the phrase 'sicut per sortem acciderit'; and a grant of two half-acres in 1422 has the more specific phrase 'sicut in sorte Abbatis et sorte de Whitemeyes acciderit'.¹ These phrases need, perhaps, some explanation.

Hay meadows were of great value in the mediaeval manor. They were not possessed by every community, being dependent upon the neighbourhood of a river. It has been calculated that, on an average, meadow land was reckoned at from six to ten times the value of arable; and the Survey of 1552 shows that at Burford a single acre of meadow was the equivalent holding for a virgate of twenty acres of arable. Consequently the meadow and the arable were controlled by the early communities in quite different ways. In the arable a man held his various acre strips permanently; a strip he once acquired was always his. But for the meadow, since it was so valuable, a system was devised whereby the strips might change hands every year, so that each in turn might have his chance of getting the crop from the better parts, and no one would be permanently confined to the poorer parts. This was achieved by an annual casting of lots. But again, if the lots had been cast once for the whole of each man's holding, sufficient variation might not be secured. Therefore the hay land was divided into a certain number of meads, three, four, or more, and the lots were cast in each portion. Thus a right to an acre means, not a single acre, but an acre each time the lots were cast. In the Burford meadow there seem to have been four such divisions, so that an acre in this case would mean four acres.

Hence a man's holding in the meadow was not like his holding in the arable, a definite piece of ground to be described by its position ; it was only a right to so much ground, which might be in one spot one year and in quite a different spot the next year. Obviously, however, it would soon become necessary for a man owning rights in the meadow to be able to describe them in some definite way for documentary purposes when he wished to sell his land, for instance. To meet this requirement the lots were named. In one case in which these ancient customs are still in operation, the old lots are cast with small balls of some hard wood—holly or box—on each of which a name is written, and every man's holding is known by one of those names.¹ Each time the ball with that name comes out of the bag, he receives his acre or half-acre of ground for that year's mowing. Thus he is able, if he wishes to describe his meadow rights for purposes of sale, to say that he owns an acre or a half-acre of So-and-So, using the name on the ball. The gift of meadow land to Burford Church in 1422 shows that precisely this system was in use here ; the donor describes his gift by the names of the lots.²

Of the men of mediaeval Burford there are a few who come down to us as more than shadows. We have, for instance, our first glimpse of the men of authority in John Wenryche and Thomas Spicer, who drew up the Gild Certificate in 1382 and were frequently in demand for the witnessing of grants and taking charge of trusts. Then there is the company of men who have writ their names large in the glories of Burford Church, and have been more fitly commemorated in another chapter—the Spicers, Leggare, Bishop, and Pynnok. Pynnok we may know better than most of them, because his will which has come down among the Records contains more domestic detail than the will, also among the Records, of Henry Bishop. It is in one sense, perhaps, disappointing ; for, in comparison with wills of the same period in other towns, it betrays the fact that the more important Burford Burgess was less well off than men of his class elsewhere. His household gear—tables and chests, sheets and blankets, brass pans and cooking vessels, brewing plant, wooden platters, tin and silver spoons, warming stoves, and so on—is of a fair level of comfort for the time. But his personal gear is very modest—a saddle and bridle, a ‘poll-ax’ and a sword, for his journeyings; a dyed girdle or two, a cloak or two and some pieces of amber. One phrase in the will casts an interesting sidelight on the life of the good-sized burgage houses. A certain chest is among the bequests, and is described as ‘stantem in camera que vocatur Hardyngs chamber’. This curious name was difficult to account for until an entry in the Eynsham Cartulary illuminated it. In the list of expenses for the year 1471 appears: ‘Et in diversis pannis lineis emptis de Iohanne Hardyng de Burefford xxs. vid.’¹ Now Hardyng is not a name found among those constantly associated with Pynnok in the Burford Records; yet we should have expected to find it if he was a Burford man. It may be conjectured that the name ‘Hardyngs chamber’ is a strange little indication of a system of partnership. Burford men owning good-sized houses may have kept a room for the use of merchants and traders coming to the town from elsewhere, who may thus have acquired a sufficient status to avail themselves of the privileges of Burford residents in the market, and may in turn have provided for their Burford hosts similar privileges in their own towns.

More vividly human even than those of Pynnok’s will are some of the touches to be found in the early files of the Chancery. There we meet persons like John Sclatter and John Stowe, whom we might otherwise have taken for unexceptionable fellows, going ‘with force of arms’ to the house of John Dyer and carrying off in one encounter a horse, in another a mixed lot of goods, and in yet another a maid servant whom they detained for a year and a half—an epic feud. There is much human nature too in the complaint of John Hatter that he could not obtain justice against Thomas Alys and John Irnemonger, who had assaulted him and his wife, because Alys and Irnemonger were on such good terms with the Sheriff and Deputy-Sheriff of the county. Again, Pynnok's gifts to the Church are laid open to some criticism by the fact that he had a debt of £80 outstanding, which his pious generosity rendered him unable to meet.¹

But a wider horizon has to be added to our picture to include some solid men of Burford before we leave our account of the Middle Ages. The inscription, now lost, on the tomb of John Pynnok who died in 1480² records him as 'eldest son of Thomas Pinnock gentleman formerly of the Society of Gray's Inn'; which shows that the family had ideas and associations beyond Burford and its wool industries. John Stowe, again, was of sufficient consequence to marry a Berkshire heiress; indeed, it is through him that the well-known family of Eyston of East Hendred obtained that manor and estate. John Stowe had married Maud de Arches, heiress of the Turberville estates at East Hendred. His daughter, Isabel, married John Eyston, and as her father's heir brought the estates with her. The Stowe arms—argent a chevron gules between three crows proper, beaked and legged or—are still quartered by the Eystons.³ Yet another of our citizens must have had a life more interesting than any of these. The Bill of Attainder passed in 1485 by Henry VII's first Parliament, against Richard III and his adherents, which opens with the resounding names of John Duke of Norfolk and Thomas Earl of Surrey, ends with the name of William Brampton of Burford. The name of Brampton is found at intervals in our Records from the late fourteenth century onwards, the first William Brampton being sometimes described as 'of Oxford'. He seems to have been followed by a Thomas Brampton, and then by this William of the Attainder who is often to be seen in Burford annals going about his business as a mercer and dealing with house property. There is nothing to show how he became involved in affairs of State and in such high company. Seven years after his death the Act of Attainder, so far as it concerned himself and his heirs, was reversed on the petition of his sister and heir, then the wife of Hugh Johnson, a Burford man.¹ This, however, did not restore all the property Brampton had forfeited: he had owned the George Inn, and this had been granted by Henry VII to one of his household—John Basket, and after Basket's death Henry VIII granted it to William Gower, one of his Grooms of the Chamber.² Brampton appears to have been the only person who ever brought Burford into the perilous eminence of an Act of Attainder.

Signs of increasing wealth in the place are frequent in the Records throughout a great part of the fifteenth century. Some are direct, such as the gifts to the Church and the Gild, the foundation of the Almshouses, and the institution of Charities for the poor. Another indication is the constant traffic in house property, with a general tendency towards the acquisition of houses by Burford residents from owners living elsewhere.³ A part of the apparent enrichment should be attributed, doubtless, to the easier command of currency rather than to actual advance in wealth. Nevertheless, a certain increase in material prosperity is, at this time, to be seen in the town.

The aspect of the place was beginning to change, from the freer use of stone in domestic building, this improvement being dictated in the main by sheer necessity. The early timber building would not be very durable, especially if neglected; and the number of references in sixteenth-century Records to houses in decay shows that a considerable amount of rebuilding must now have become necessary. It would be helped forward, also, by the more vigorous working of the freestone quarry, as its value had become apparent, and by the influence of the skilled masons at work on the Church in this period of its enlargement and adornment.

Certain remains of the domestic building of this time—the latter half of the fifteenth century—are not open to the casual visitor of to-day. Behind many a comparatively uninteresting Burford frontage—tucked away in back courts or surviving incongruously in later pieces of building—is a considerable number of archways and window openings of early date ; and one of the most curious features of Burford, for the inquiring mind, is the manner in which its houses, when seen from their backs, reveal a quite different architectural history from that which their frontages suggested.

Of fifteenth-century survivals three examples may be particularly noted. One is the arch with ball-flower ornament to be seen in the back wall of the forge of Messrs. Howse and Son, on the west side of the High Street. This house has a fine arched passage-way from the street. The second is a stone-vaulted cellar with a central pillar of stone under London House—a noble and interesting piece of domestic building. The third, and much the most important specimen, is the cottage beside the Bull Inn back gate, and next to the Mason's Arms. Here, incorporated now in the party wall, is a row of four pointed arches, rising from what might be termed large and strong mullions rather than pillars (they are not circular or square, but narrow and deep uprights

This same house was the one that, until recent years, had a fifteenth-century chimney above it: the chimney rose in fact above the very wall in which the extraordinary row of arches survives, and a curious little stone bracket is now just below where the chimney used to stand. At the other end of the block of building of which the cottage-forms a part is a piece of very ancient structure in which was a pointed archway, deeply moulded, with Decorated carving above it.¹

It is natural, perhaps, that remains such as these, and the vaulted cellar, should be popularly explained as relics of 'chapels', or associated with the Priory, in the belief that pointed arches must be, in some way, ecclesiastical. But such belief is groundless; and, in the case of the many-arched cottage, it can be demonstrated to be wrong; for this house adjoining the Bull back gate can be identified in the Records of Burford as far back as 1500. It is practically certain, too, that the house given to the Church by John Pinnock in 1473 stood close by. And in neither of these cases do the early deeds make any mention of chapels or of buildings of an ecclesiastical character. Nor, indeed, is any such explanation required. A rich burgess, building his house of stone in the later part of the fifteenth century, might well construct such a cellar as the one beneath London House or adorn his dwelling with the Witney Street arches—arches which were a normal feature of building work of the time. Exactly what purpose the row of arches with deep shelves was made to serve may not be easy to determine, but that they belonged to a domestic building all the available evidence goes to show. Of the general architectural style that the new ideas in building developed at this time we have happily one or two almost complete examples left. Means of recognizing the type is afforded us by the ability to date the Almshouse structure.² Bishop obtained his licence to erect it in 1456, and his will, made in 1478, contains no provision for the building, which must therefore have been finished by that date. Although, as a tablet on the building records, it was to some extent rebuilt in 1828, it obviously retains most of its original features. Of these the principal ones are narrow doorways with a pointed arch; square-headed windows divided by stonework into more than one light¹; a flat frontage; and a long, unbroken roof-line.

If we look at the house standing near by, at the southern corner of Church Lane and the High Street, it is easy to see in it precisely the kind of domestic building which would result from carrying out in the early Tudor period, on a rather ampler scale and with the modifications arising in an interval of twenty or thirty years, the architectural type visible in the Almshouse. The flat frontage, the unbroken roof-line, the square-headed windows, are immediately recognizable, though the doorway shows a later date of building and some of the windows have been mutilated by alterations. But the whole building is loftier, showing a greater height allotted to each storey; dormers in the roof give it a third storey; and the windows, while taller and wider, are also much plainer, and of a more strictly domestic order. It can hardly be doubted, comparing this structure with the other, that this house gives us very distinctly the new type of stone-built burgage at its best,² perhaps some thirty or forty years later than the Almshouse.

From it we can recognize, especially by looking at upper storeys, which have suffered less than the ground floors reconstructed for shop premises, several houses of the period, of differing sizes. They may all be dated within a space of about a hundred years, that being the period during which the style lasted. As we can date its origin, so we can fix the time at which it gave way to another type. In the latter part of the sixteenth century houses were built by Simon Wisdom, who recorded the date in some cases on tablets let into the walls. Thus we know that the tenement by the bridge, which so charmingly closes the view down the High Street, is of the year 1576.¹ It shows one development in particular from the type we have been considering, so marked as to constitute a new style. The windows of the uppermost floor are not set back in the roof as dormers, but are brought out to the line of the frontage in bold gables rising nearly as high as the ridge-line of the roof. The result is that the roof-line no longer strikes the eye as straight and rigid; it is in effect broken by the tall gables rising in front of it and carrying their ridges back to it; moreover, the long gutters or valleys at the junction of these gables with the roof break the upper structure into bays. The type at its best is a worthy successor to the earlier Tudor type, plain yet dignified, not concerned with ornament, but achieving distinction by its varied lines and proportions.

Again, as in the previous case, the dating of an example enables us to recognize the work of this period elsewhere in the town. In general the square-headed doorways and windows persist; but in a few cases where a larger entrance was required (as at the George Inn) a depressed arch is found. One building in Sheep Street is interesting, as the single instance in Burford in which modification of the type becomes reminiscent of a building style seen in Chipping Campden and other Cotswold towns; the frontage line, instead of being flat, is carried out in two bays rising to the line of the eaves.²

The great increase in stone building would by itself have made a very striking difference in the outward aspect of Burford. But to it must be added the advance of the town up the hill. This appears to have taken place only in the latter half of the sixteenth century. No house on the hill displays the characteristics of the early Tudor type of domestic building; but there are several, including one at the very top on the west side, which can be assigned at a glance to the Elizabethan type. Moreover, it is not until about 1570 that we have documentary references to houses on the hill. Even then the town did not there present the continuous lines of house-fronts that the older streets must have presented. Descriptions of houses on the hill frequently give, as the boundary on one side or the other, 'the land' of some other owner, not another tenement; so that clearly many open spaces were left.

Otherwise the ground-plan of the town remained as we have seen it in the preceding period. All the principal streets appear under the same names, with the addition that now the name of Church Lane is found. Curiously enough, the lower lane to the church is not mentioned at all on the Survey of 1552. The explanation probably is (as we might easily suppose from the look of the lane to-day) that at the date of the Survey there were no houses there to be recorded among the town tenements. The ground had, in our view of the place during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, been mostly gardens and closes, with a fringe of houses at the corners of the High Street and towards Church Green and the upper lane. What tenements there were in the lower lane may very likely have been but a few small and ancient dwellings of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries surviving from the Domesday settlement near the Burh. They would by this time have disappeared; so that the only houses to be entered on the Survey would be in such positions that they would be entered as either in the High Street or in Church Lane. The latter name included, for the purposes of this document, Church Green, since the Almshouses are described as in Church Lane.

We can, however, add to our ground-plan two by-ways not previously mentioned. The lane leading out of Witney Street opposite Gildenford Lane appears as Batts Lane. The continuation of it up the hill to the top road seems to be indicated by the entry on the Survey of a certain way which the tenants of Holwell have the right to use for taking their sheep to the water at Gildenford; no other lane in Burford would be so likely to have had this purpose.

It may be added that the first mention of the Tolsey by that name occurs in 1561. There is no previous reference to the actual building in which the Bailiffs had held the Borough Court; but the Tolsey, even as it stands to-day after much repair and reconstruction, retains enough ancient building to show that, although this is the first occurrence of the name in the Records, it was applied to the old Court House. Proof, if any were needed, of the truth of the tradition that it consisted of an upper storey carried on pillars is provided by an entry in 1579 of a payment for repairing 'the pillars and stairs' of the Tolsey.¹ Yet the substructure must have been to some extent enclosed towards the back, for there is a lease, dated 1580, of a shop 'adjoining to the Tolsey and lying next to Sheep Street'.² It is unlikely that this shop would have stood on one side or the other, where the openings from Sheep Street led round, leaving the Tolsey as a kind of island. The more probable situation would be at the back; and in fact no traces of old pillars can be seen in as much of the back wall as is now visible.

This was the Burford—a bright and prosperous little Burford with its fresh stone buildings, and green with its closes and garden grounds—which Queen Elizabeth saw when she paid the visit recorded with so much satisfaction in the Corporation Memorandum Book.³ She came, as the record shows, from Langley, being there doubtless on a visit to the old royal hunting lodge, since she was not at that time on one of her famous Progresses through her kingdom; and she received the 'purse of gold' (in this case containing twenty angels) which was the form wherein her subjects were expected to display their gratification at sight of her.

It appears that she must have been here again at a later date, though of this we have no local record. In September 1592 she was making a Progress, and having come from London by way of Newbury, Ramsbury, and Cirencester, she was entertained for some days at Sudeley Castle.⁴ Thence she went to Woodstock, and so to Oxford. Now Lord Burghley's diary of events in that month includes the following entries: ⁵

Sep. 9. The Q. cam to Sudley Castell.

Sep. 14. To Shyrborn, Dottons hous. Teyntonbre. (sic).

Sep. 15. At Burford.

Sep. 16. To Wytney.

Burghley was in attendance on the Queen, and his use of a different form—'I went' or 'I came'—in later entries implies that the entries quoted refer to movements of the Queen. Moreover, from Sherborne to Woodstock the Queen's way would naturally take her through Burford. A particular point of interest is that the form 'At Burford', taken in conjunction with the sequence of dates, makes it fairly clear that on this occasion the Queen actually stayed the night here. It is difficult to think where she can have been lodged, unless we may assume that already Lawrence Tanfield's new house on the Priory site was at the disposal of a royal visitor.

The extension of the town up the hill is as much enlargement as we need look for; the population, even at this stage of the town's prosperity, did not call for any great multiplication of dwellings. From all the indications that can be used for making an estimate it would appear that until, at any rate, the end of the century the total population was under a thousand. The earliest fact of much service for our purpose is to be found in the Chantry Certificate of 1547.¹ On this the number of 'howselyng people'—or, as we should now say, communicant members of the Church of England—is entered as 544. In estimating from this figure several points must be borne in mind.² The first is that at that date the age of Confirmation and First Communion was much lower than at present; next, there was no other church than the Church of England; thirdly, it was a serious matter of misdemeanour to be notably lax in attending Divine Service, or to fail to attend the statutory minimum of Communion; and fourthly, the tendency of those who furnished returns for the Certificate would naturally be to enter the highest possible figures of Church membership. On all these grounds the 'howselyng people' must be taken as representing a proportion of the population out of all relation to modern standards. Every one over the age of twelve or so would be included. Therefore, if we follow the reasonable course of taking the figure as standing for about two-thirds of the inhabitants of all ages, we should arrive at a total population of some 825 souls.

² There seems to be no authoritative pronouncement as to the proportion which the number of these 'howselyng people' may reasonably be held to bear to the total population. I have proceeded on certain considerations which are set out above; and the fact that the figures thus arrived at tally well with those derived from calculations on quite a different basis does give validity to those considerations.

This is fairly accordant with such calculations as can be made from the Edwardian Survey of the manor and town. That document gives us upon analysis one hundred and forty households in the town, made up of twelve holdings of a burgage and a half, one of a burgage and a quarter, eighty-four single burgages, forty-two half-burgages, and one quarter-burgage. On this basis the town population should have been about 700.¹ To this must be added the population of Upton and Signett, since, as the one Church of Burford served all three members of the parish, the hamlets must have been included in the reckoning of the 'howselyng people'. The Survey gives, for Upton and Signett, ten messuages. But from the *Domesday of Enclosures*² it is plain that several tenements existed on a single messuage; in one case there were four, in another, though no figure is given, the value entered shows that there were more than this. Supposing that we allow for thirty tenements altogether on the ten messuages (which is not too much, seeing that in 1326-7 the number of households in the hamlets was 33) we shall add 150 to the town inhabitants, and arrive at a total population of 850, which is near enough to the estimate based on the number of 'howselyng people' five years earlier. To give a margin for the greater crowding of the time, and for other circumstances, we may put the number in round figures at 900.³

³ It has been supposed, from a misquoted reference, that the population in the sixteenth century must have been much larger than this. The reference upon which such calculations have been based will be found in Part III, p. 655, in a letter from Thomas Cade, Vicar of Burford, to Thomas Cromwell. The statement there made that the clothier Tucker

Forty years later there is evidence that a long time of comparative peace and plenty had again enlarged the population. An assessment list for the Lay Subsidy of 1596 contains 120 names. Now the list for 1524 shows only 78 names. The advance must not be attributed wholly to a proportionate increase of population ; it would be due in great measure to a more widely spread ability to pay the small sums taxed, of which the majority are sixpence or less. If we consider that the number of inhabitants had increased by one-third, that is the utmost allowance that need be made to explain the figures of 1596 ; and we shall thus conclude that by the end of the century the population had risen to some 1200.

There is indication now of very much more marked differences in wealth than we were able to find in the previous period. The richest man of whom we have record is one John Busbyne or Busbye, assessed at £200 in goods and paying £10 to the Subsidies. For so rich a man, he appears singularly little in our Records. He served as Bailiff in 1524 and 1527, ; but is not found holding any other office, not even that of a Feoffee of Charity Lands. After 1527 the name is not seen again except in the entry on the Survey of 1552 of one Richard Busby of Islington as holding a burgage in High Street and a close in Batts Lane.

Apart from him, however, there is a small group of men ranking by themselves in the assessments—William Hodges at £80, Richard Smyth at £50, Peter Eynesdale, Thomas Teysdale, and John Lambert at £40. Next to them come ten men assessed at between £10 and £20. Thirty-seven assessments are between £3 and £10, and twenty-eight under £3.

This gives us a classification which may usefully be compared with the rough classification of the burgage holders.

employed 500 persons has been misquoted as a statement that he employed 500 persons at Burford, and it has been argued from this that, if 500 persons were employed by one man, the total population must have been very large. But it is not stated that he employed 500 at Burford. On the contrary, it is explicitly stated that he sent much of his work to Abingdon and Stroud.

The figures do not exactly correspond, but they are interestingly parallel. We have fifteen men of comfortable substance on the Subsidy—five whom we might call 'forty-pound men', and ten whom we might call 'twenty-pound men'—and thirteen holders of tenements comprising more than a single burgage. We have sixty-five men on the Subsidy who may be taken as the general run of tradesmen and craftsmen in the town, and eighty-four holdings of a single burgage. Finally, it may be noted from the number of servants taxed as such on their wages, that ten households in the town kept these men-servants.

In other words, the improved, more systematic civic life of Burford in the sixteenth century can now be seen as a reflection of its attainment at last to the natural and obvious characteristics of a market and manufacturing town. The old equality between the town residents and those of the hamlets has disappeared. Only one man in the hamlets is assessed at anything like the higher town figures, and his assessment is but £20. That is to say, the richest group in the town is now beyond all comparison with the agricultural tenants, and even the second group comes out as essentially of the town. Moreover, the gap between these two groups implies that better brains and energy were going into the town's trade, and reaping the results; while at the same time stimulating a competitive spirit, which has its effect in the existence of the small group between the richest men and the mass of the tradesmen.

A fair idea of the general spread of the prosperity accompanying the particular successes thus traceable can be derived from the one Muster Roll for Burford. Forty-seven men are entered as of substance to equip themselves or their substitutes as archers, and forty-one to do the same as billmen. It is useful to compare this with the Witney Muster Roll of the same date. Throughout the Lay Subsidy lists Witney is entered for higher sums than Burford. Yet its Muster Roll shows a smaller total—70 as against 88—and still more significantly shows only twenty-seven men to provide archers. The deduction from this is that, although Witney may have had men of greater individual wealth, whose taxes would make the Subsidy totals larger than those of Burford, there was in Burford a much greater number of men of moderate substance, and the general level of trading prosperity was higher.

It happens that less can be said about the actual trades pursued here during the sixteenth century than could be said about those of the earlier period. The occupations of persons mentioned in grants and leases are not so often inserted; and no such illuminating document as the grant of the Bridge tolls occurs to assist us. But all the trades previously mentioned can be found recorded, while the saddlers, who were soon to make their trade famous here, begin to appear. It is also clear, from the fines in the Court Rolls of 1547 and 1549, that business was becoming good enough to lead to the setting up of permanent shops for victuals, instead of the trade being confined to market days. Several bakers, butchers, fishmongers, and vintners were carrying on trade apart from the market. It is also clear from the same Rolls that Burford was already the town of inns which it so markedly was later on. Alehouse keepers, inn keepers, brewers, and keepers of hostelries are rather numerous; and the grant of the George Inn to servants of the Royal Household implies that an inn here must have been worth possessing. That the George was at this time the chief inn may be gathered from the fact that it is the only inn mentioned by name in the Survey of 1552. Others recorded in various town grants and leases were the Bull (in the same position as the Bull of to-day, since its back gate on Witney Street is mentioned), the Crown (which was the old Novum Hospitium Angulare at the northern corner of Sheep Street and the High Street), the Angel (apparently next to the Bull at the corner of Witney Street), and the Bear.

The mills had increased in number. Besides the two called Burford Mills there were now a corn-mill at Upton and a fulling mill in Burford. The latter may be taken to be the one at the end of Witney Street, at the present day the electric light works. At any rate the Survey places a mill there, in the description of a close as lying 'in Witneystret iuxta le Walkemylle'. All four mills were leased by the Crown in 1521 to another servant of the Royal Household, Thomas Wildyng, a Yeoman of the Ewery; in 1538, upon

Wildyng's death, John Jones, a Burford man, took over the lease. In 1545 Edmund Harman bought them; the fulling mill he sold later to Edmond Silvester.¹

Further analysis of the Edwardian Survey shows how complete was that separate development of the town, apart from the hamlets, which the Lay Subsidies indicate. It is on the Survey that the hamlets appear for the first time with the distinct title of 'The Manor of Bury Barns'. The details under that head have several interesting features.

Firstly, we can see how the new ideas of farming, which were giving rise to so many complaints in the political satires of the time, had here replaced the old system. At our last view of the hamlets in 1299 and 1307 the old order was, of course, still undisturbed; twelve tenants in Signett held a full virgate, and three a half-virgate; in Upton there were seven virgaters and one half-virgater. Thus in the two there were twenty-three tenants with twenty-one virgates. In 1552 the holdings are almost doubled in extent, but the tenants number less than half; there are ten tenants with thirty-five virgates. Four of the tenants are still small cultivators, two holding a virgate and two a half-virgate. Of the rest one man holds seven virgates with two messuages, three hold four virgates each, one has three and a half virgates, and two have three virgates each. Here, on a small scale, is precisely that gathering of the farm land into a few hands which was one of the great economic perils and problems of the time. It was inevitable, no doubt; as capital increased, and commercial ideas improved, the power to make money out of the land was bound to have its way. The change would be seen comparatively early in manors like this, which included a borough; the prosperity of the tradesmen would provide capital for engrossing the land on the skirts of the town. Nor is Burford devoid of the evil which followed upon this engrossing. Two cases here of destruction of tenements on the agricultural messuages appear in the Domesday of Enclosures, the local instances of another inevitable process in the creation of large farms, namely, the expulsion from tenements, which had now lost their old fixed relation to the virgates, of those who had become labourers for a wage instead of independent virgate-holders.¹ The man who held four virgates did not need for himself the four tenements they had once supported; he wanted a single, and better, house, and the tenements disappeared to make way for it, leaving the occupiers to find cottages as best they could.

The number of virgate tenants entered on the Survey leaves us in no doubt that by this time any portions of the later common fields, which may have been uncultivated in 1500, were in use. The portion north of the ridge road near White Hill must have been broken up, and the small detached portion near Holwell;¹ and the fields must have been much as they were at the time of the Enclosure. At that date the Burford and Signett Fields stretched from the eastern boundary of the parish beyond White Hill to the junction with Upton Fields on the west, and from the Shil Brook on the south to the Witney-Northleach road on the north, taking in also a portion beyond this road on the White Hill slope. This area and Upton Fields both north and south of the Witney-Northleach road contained together, at the dates of the Enclosure Awards, 1,955 acres. For the thirty-five virgates of the tenants of 1552, together with the six virgates held in demesne and six and a half virgates held by tenants in the town we require, on the Survey's allowance of twenty-four acres to the virgate, 2,280 acres.² These, however, were customary acres, not the modern surveyed acres, and the apparent discrepancy need not disturb us. At the same time, this virgate total can hardly be accommodated unless by the middle of the sixteenth century the common fields had already attained their full extent.

This reveals the interesting fact that the arable land held by the borough inhabitants was not now common field land at all. In earlier days the townsmen had held in the fields side by side with the people of the hamlets. In 1552 not only is it impossible to find room, at the extreme extent of the fields, for more than the hamlet tenants, but the entries concerning the town holdings are of so distinct a form that they clearly have nothing to do with the common field. They are in no case complete virgates or fractions of virgates; they are all of an arbitrary number of acres. They carry no commonable rights ; and the tenant has only a single cropping of them in the year. As it happens, two residents in the town did hold in the common fields, and the difference is at once apparent ; for in their cases the virgate measurements apply, nothing is said about a single cropping, and it is specifically recorded that they have common with the tenants of the manor of Bury Barns, and owe suit to that court for this land. These entries, put beside the others concerning arable land held with town tenements, prove beyond question that the arable of the townsmen was not in the common fields.

² It may perhaps be remarked again that the virgate area as entered on documents has to be doubled in order to give the true extent. Half the common field was fallowed each year, so that a virgate holding has to mean a virgate in each field alternately.

We need not be at a loss to discern where it was. The map which represents the Enclosure Award shows several stretches of old enclosures. One lies on the hill-side immediately east of the town, its name, the Leasowes, indicating old enclosure. Another is found at Sturt, in the south-eastern extremity of the parish ; another beyond Signett towards Westwell, again at the extremity of the parish. Roughly speaking these areas contain about 520 modern acres. The arable land entered to town tenants in the Survey amounts to 789 acres. The discrepancy between the modern and the old customary acre is here rather larger than in the case of the common fields ; but it is likely that in enclosures the acre was often overestimated. At any rate, with these old enclosures before us, we may conclude that the town arable was, as might be expected, situated in such places on the edges of the common fields as the virgate holders had left outside their cultivated area.

The meadow holdings of borough and hamlets had become equally distinct. 'In the earlier days town and agricultural tenants alike had held in High Mead, the riverside meadow east of the town. But the 1552 Survey shows that the meadow west of the town had become equally important, and it was here, in Veronhill and Wyldmore Meads,¹ that the hamlet tenants held their meadow. It is remarkable that in this matter the town tenants retained the older land, and were not reduced to taking what the virgaters left. But of course meadow is on a very different footing from arable in this respect—that old arable has a value accruing to it from past cultivation and manuring; whereas one meadow, in days when no manure was given to such land, was no better than another as well situated in relation to the river. The reason why the virgaters moved from High Mead may well be that, when the demesne portion was taken out of it, the remainder, while corresponding closely to the virgate holdings of 1299–1307, was too small for the requirements of the more numerous virgaters of 1552. The town holdings of meadow amount in the Survey to 21 acres, which, with the demesne meadow here of seven acres and one or two small enclosed portions, make up the thirty acres of High Mead. But the hamlet tenants required $41\frac{1}{2}$ acres, and evidently moved to the western meadows to find them. High Mead, thus left to the town tenants, reveals the change in the arbitrary character of the holdings there. The virgaters maintain in their meads the strict relation of one acre of meadow to a virgate. Among the town tenants we find men with 143 and 110 acres of arable possessed of only one acre and one and a half acres respectively of meadow, while a man with only 44 acres of arable has $5\frac{1}{2}$ acres of meadow.

The processes of divergent development on the part of the town and the hamlets must, of course, have been gradual. But the Survey of 1552 enables us to see them as practically complete, and we can understand better how the necessity had arisen for providing separate names for two such distinct kinds of community. We may indicate the change (speaking now not historically, but loosely) by saying that the old mediaeval manor of Burford, consisting of a territory with a privileged community living on part of it, has disappeared, and in its place there is a town with farm lands around it. Town and farm land are, indeed, still joint members of a single lordship; but from henceforth their histories run in quite separate directions.

The story of the hamlets becomes ever more meagre. The tenancy of the manor domain we can follow through nearly the whole of the century. It was leased by the Crown to one William Gittyns or Gittons in 1526 for a term of 21 years. In 1542 Thomas Edgare obtained a similar lease to commence on the expiry of Gittyns's tenancy. But he can never have taken this up, because at just about the time when Gittyns's term was expiring Edmund Harman took a lease for three lives. He may perhaps have farmed the land himself, since the Survey of 1552 mentions no sub-tenant. Upon his death the Crown leased the manor lands to three joint tenants, John (or Thomas) Moore, Thomas Cooke, and Margaret Curteis, for 21 years; and at the end of that time to Richard Bell, who presumably did sub-let the land, for he is himself described as of Gray's Inn, London.

The house at Bury Barns was still in a real sense the manor house; the Courts of which we have record in 1547 and 1549 must have been held in it. But the fact that its occupiers were not owners of the manorial rights must have tended to weaken the association of those rights with this house, and so have prepared the way for that entire loss of the manor house tradition which was inevitable, when new lords of the manor, the first resident owners of the rights, established themselves in a mansion built on the site of the Hospital.

The history of the town, on the other hand, becomes more ample and more interesting. Many circumstances, as the History of the Corporation has shown, combined to make it so; but no one who studies the Records can fail to notice the mark upon the age made by two or three individuals—a mark so strong as to produce the impression that without them no material circumstances would have availed to make this century quite what it was in Burford.

Foremost among them all is Simon Wisdom. We first meet the name in 1530, when in the course of the Bishop of Lincoln's investigations of heresy in his diocese

Simon Wisdom of Burford was charged in judgment for having 3 books in English, one was the Gospels in English, another was the Psalter, the third was the summ of Holy Scripture in English.

He abjured, and no penance or punishment is recorded in the case.¹

In 1538 a Simon Wisdom was Collector of the Lay Subsidy for the Hundreds of Bampton and Chadlington;² and in the same year the name appears among the Burford Burgesses. There is no earlier trace of the name of Wisdom in Burford, and it would appear likely that Simon came of a family of substance³ living elsewhere, and settled himself here. He must have lived to a good age, for he was certainly alive in 1581. There is no need to assume that we have to deal with a father and son of the same name. For if the notable Simon Wisdom was old enough to become a Burgess in 1538 (and no other of the name appears later, so that this must be our Simon) he would not be too young to have been charged in 1530. The absence of any penance implies the likelihood that it was a case against a quite young man or even a lad.

In 1539 he was tenant of some of the Priory lands situated at Great Rissington, and in 1553 he was Steward of the Burgesses. From that time on he must have devoted himself to the town, being Alderman of the Gild for no less than twenty-two years, and serving more than once as Bailiff. To him we owe the only Memorandum Book of the Corporation, which is largely written with his own hand. That he had a particular taste for system and organization may be seen not only from his draft in this book of the oath to be taken by the Steward of the Corporation, but still more in the Rules and Constitutions composed by him for the conduct of the Grammar School. The great part he took in the foundation of the School is related elsewhere, in the Introduction to the School Records. He also established a small Almshouse, and benefited the town by rebuilding much of the dilapidated charity property. He was a man of several occupations; he is described on occasions both as a clothier and a mercer; but in 1547 and 1549 he is found acting as a fish merchant, and in 1552 he held so much arable land that he may have been a farmer as well, especially as he describes himself sometimes as 'yeoman'. Building must have had a peculiar attraction for him; no man has left his name or his device on so many houses in the town. It is a singular fact that, after all he did for Burford, there should be no record of his burial-place, nor any sort of memorial to him. He died about 1585, apparently unmarried; no lease or conveyance of any of his numerous bits of property mentions a wife. One Raphe Wisdom, perhaps a nephew, carried on the name for some time in Burford; it lasted longer in the family of a brother, Thomas Wisdom, at Shipton.

No figure can quite be placed beside Simon Wisdom's for interest. Yet Peter Eynesdale, the first who actually bears the title of Alderman in the Records, and who brought the Gild through the rather perilous period of the Reformation, deserves to be mentioned. He was energetic in charge of Church and Charity Lands. At the other end of the century, Richard Merywether stands out as the one successor to Simon Wisdom who appears to have had something like his vigour and capacity. He was the leading spirit in the recovery of the confiscated Charity Lands in 1595; and the Roll of the Burgess Rules and Customs was drawn up while he was Alderman, therefore probably upon his suggestion and advice.

Of the attitude and the inclinations of Burford men during the Civil War we have no knowledge. If feelings ran high on one side or the other, nothing has come down to us which reveals them. It is unfortunate that, so soon after the sixteenth-century Memorandum Book was filled, should have come the dispute with Sir Lawrence Tanfield and the extinction of all the duties that would have made the keeping of another Memorandum Book likely; and equally unfortunate that this disaster should in its turn have been followed so soon by the Royal Commission's reconstitution of the charities. 'Resentful, we may well imagine, perhaps also rather bewildered by what had befallen them and the comparative insignificance to which they were reduced, the Burgesses never again attempted to keep even those casual records which the habits of Simon Wisdom preserved for us through thirty years of the sixteenth century. Even before disaster fell upon the Burgesses, that kind of record had become very fragmentary. It had not been entirely dropped ; in 1600 some one, apparently Symon Symons, then Steward of the Burgesses, drew up a statement as to the recovery by the town of the confiscated Charity Lands. This is precisely the kind of thing that might have had its place in a new Memorandum Book. But it stands alone, bound up now as the first few leaves of an Account Book.

There is thus no section of the Records in which we can look for light upon the townsfolk's feelings in the Civil War. We can indeed be sure of one or two Royalists ; the Calendar of the Committee for the Advance of Money enters three sums from Burford. Leonard Yates lent £40, David Hughes 14 guineas, and Thomas Silvester £77, and the contributions of Yates and Silvester are, for their position, large. On the other hand it is to be observed that there are but three loans, and there were at least a score of men in Burford whose circumstances were no humbler than those of Yates and Hughes. For the rest we have only isolated facts which show Burford at times in the track of war. The town first saw fighting on New Year's Eve of 1642/3.¹ On December 30, 1642, Sir John Byron had been ordered to proceed with his whole regiment to Burford, to convoy two cartloads of ammunition for the Marquis of Hertford, who was expected at Stow on the following day. On reaching Burford, Byron made inquiries about the Parliament forces at Cirencester, and we may perhaps catch a glimpse of the townsmen's sympathies in the fact that he could 'get no satisfaction' from them. But the position of Burford, near enough to Oxford to be drawn into trouble, yet not near enough to be occupied permanently by either side, may well have inclined the inhabitants to caution, and we need not conclude from this incident that the place was Parliamentary in feeling. Byron sent a patrol out towards Cirencester, and they, after approaching to within a mile and a half of that town, brought back word that there were not above five hundred dragoons there. The next day, a Saturday, passed quietly until seven o'clock at night, when another patrol from the Cirencester road came in with news that about two miles from Burford they had met four dragoons, who, on encountering them, had ridden back so fast that they could not be captured. Byron at once ordered one of his captains to take forty men along the Cirencester road, and warned the whole regiment to be in readiness at the sound of the trumpet. He then went up the hill to post sentries, apparently at the cross roads by Bury Barns. Coming back into the town he found that half of the party ordered to the Cirencester road had not yet started; but before he could give any other orders muskets began to go off; the Parliamentarians were in the town. Byron's first care was to secure the Bridge with a 'competent' party of horse under his Lieutenant-Colonel, to avoid being cut off from Lord Hertford, and to dispatch the ammunition at once with a small guard of thirty men. It is doubtful whether the Parliamentarians knew of Byron's business, and were intending to intercept the ammunition. If so, they were late in attacking, for, since Hertford was expected at Stow that day, the chances would be that the convoy would have been on its way to him before they reached Burford. The more reasonable conjecture to make is that, without knowing the cause of Byron's presence, the troops at Cirencester had heard of the patrols on the road, and had therefore come up to reconnoitre, and to attack if the chance offered. But in any case Byron's precautions were good. Having thus secured the Bridge, he returned to the town, to find the firing coming from the direction of the White Hart, 'an Inne in the utmost part of the Towne, from whence a lane leadeth to the Market Crosse'. This would place the skirmish that ensued in Witney Street, not only from the fact that an inn of that name survived in Witney Street till modern times, but also because it is not likely that, with the look-out that was being kept towards the Cirencester road, the attack could have come so suddenly from the Sheep Street side. It is more probable that the four troopers who had been observed had, on riding back to the main body, given warning that that approach to the town was watched, and the force had thereupon struck across country from the Cirencester road eastwards, so as to make a surprise attack from the other side. Byron was, in fact, being taken in the rear. But it was not a serious affair. Byron found his men being driven out of Witney Street, and seeing the danger of allowing the enemy to hold the centre of the town he rallied his men, charged in with his sword, having no other weapon, and in spite of some firing from the back of the enemy forced the Parliamentarians down Witney Street again to the inn. Here he received a wound in the face from a halberd, and finding himself ill supported (most of his troops, misunderstanding his orders, had remained about the Market Cross to secure the centre of the town) he returned to bring up more forces. But the fight in the dark was really over. When Captain Apsley tackled the inn once again the enemy were already escaping by the back door, although the one loss on Byron's side happened at this moment, a trooper being killed as he entered the inn. The Parliamentarians were pursued for six miles; but the darkness and the lack of a moon saved them.

The parish registers contain a record of the skirmish, which reveals in an interesting way the losses on either side. One man, 'slain in Burford', was buried on January 1, and six soldiers, also 'slain in Burford', on the 2nd. But as the name of the single interment is given, and the other entry only records 'six soldiers', we may conclude that the one was the loss on Byron's side, his comrades being there to give his name, and the others were the casualties left by the Parliamentarians, and therefore nameless. There appear to have been two deaths from wounds; on January 10 Thomas Tunkes, 'slaine wth the shot of musket', was buried, and on January 15 William Bolton, 'slaine in Like manner'. On the 8th had been buried 'a soldier dying of sicknes'.

Soldiers must have been about Burford early in the following year, though there are no accounts of any fighting. Andrew Royer, 'a ffrench Leiftenant slaine in Burford', was buried on February 17, 1643/4; and on March 12 'Bryan Roy an Irishman & soldier'.

Later in that year the town was within an ace of being the scene of what might have proved a most important battle. It was at Burford that Charles called the first real halt on that famous march, when he had slipped out of Oxford by night between the armies of Essex at Bletchington and Waller at Newbridge; he and his personal troop rested at the Priory,¹ and his army about the town, from the afternoon until nine o'clock at night, when they moved out again, reaching Bourton-on-the-Water by midnight. This was on June 4, 1644. Waller, getting first news of what had happened, sent some horse up so quickly that they found a few Royalists still in the town; but Essex was not here in pursuit till June 6. So there was no battle, and Essex, finding himself so far behind, stayed a few days, quartering his troops in the Church, while he summoned his principal officers to a council of war. It must have been at this time that his troopers took the banners over the Tanfield tomb for scarfs.

The result of Essex's deliberations was such that Charles was able to return to Oxford, and a fortnight later the King was back in Burford, staying the night at the George,² and going to Church to hear a sermon next morning before resuming his march. Four thousand troops and fifteen pieces of cannon, which he had left in Oxford and Abingdon, were sent to rejoin him in Burford. Again our one local record of this event may be an entry in the Register stating that 'William Callis of filkins a wounded man and lyeing under y^e chirurgeons hand at Burford dyed, and was buried y^e 4th of July'.

In November of the same year Prince Rupert was here, being joined at Burford by General Gerard with his forces.³ He came to the town on November 1. On this occasion our Registers seem to indicate some rowdiness and indiscipline. There are two entries: 'Thomas Williams a Trooper slaine by his fellow soldier with shott of a Pistoll and buried the 24th day of Novemb.'; and 'Lewis Davies a serjeant of a floote company under Generall Gerrard dyed of a wound given him by a Captaine & was buried y^e 29th of Novemb.'

Three more entries reveal to us the presence of soldiery in the town from time to time. 'John Hethewood a soldier belonging to S^r Marmaduke Langdale dyed of hurt received from a fellow soldier and was Buried y^e 30th of februar' (1644-5); 'George Rowley an officer in Prince Rupert his Army dyeing of a wound receaved was buried y^e eight of May'; and 'John Bullocke Farrier in the Lord Goreings army shott by his fellow soldier buried eodem die'. The two latter entries can be connected with the fact that Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice were in Burford with a thousand foot and a thousand horse on May 3rd.¹ It may be remarked that our Registers add one more to the proofs that the use of churches for billeting troops was not confined to one side in the war; there are entries of payments for 'takeing downe the wall for the carryinge of straw into the Church for the souldiers', and 'for makeing cleane the church when the souldiers went away'. These can only refer to the Royalist troops. An entry of a payment for ringing the bells 'for the Prince' must also refer to this visit. Rupert was here again this year, on September 14, but that was not an occasion on which he would have been gratified by the ringing of bells. The entry in the diary of his marches reads: 'Our convoye left us. Layd downe armes.'² He was on his way from Cirencester to Oxford, where on the 17th he was relieved of his command on instructions from the Lords by letter from the King, and his regiments were cashiered.

Of what the townspeople thought of all these things—the hasty marches, the to and fro of captains, the dead men in the streets—we know nothing. We cannot tell how many of them had their sympathies with Lord Falkland, whom they had so often seen among them, knowing not how a few pages of great literature were to make him a better known figure of the Civil War than many men of more forceful character. It is likely, however, that they found their guide in the new owner of the Priory, and were well content to make under Speaker Lenthall's wing the transition from one régime to the other.

The part which Burford played in one critical episode of that other régime—the famous scene of the execution here of the 'Levellers' and the suppression of the mutiny of 1649 in the Parliamentary army—offers so many points of detailed interest that it is treated in a separate chapter.

Of those other aspects of Burford history, the character of the town, the number of people it contained, their occupations and conditions, which we have followed through previous centuries, we are not left in the seventeenth century without information.

Upon the size of the town, to begin with, much light is thrown by two Burgage Rent Rolls, for the years 1652 and 1685, which somehow found their way into the Corporation Records. They differ in one respect from the Survey of 1552. In the latter document the burgage holdings are given simply as totals, without specification of the particular tenements; a man is entered as holding 'eight burgages in High Street and Witney Street', or 'three burgages in High Street'. Consequently the probable population had to be estimated on the total number of burgages. The two Burgage Rent Rolls are drawn up on a much more informative system. Each tenement is entered separately, with its situation mentioned; and—still more usefully—the number of occupiers is given. Thus we can base calculations on a recorded number of households, not on a number only conjecturally derived from a total of burgages; and we can also discover the number of households existing in each street.

The Rolls are so near in point of time and in their main statistics that it would not much matter which of them were used for calculation. The 1652 Roll enters 128 tenements and the 1685 Roll 127 tenements. The latter is, for practical reasons, the more convenient for our purpose; because the former, evidently in use for several years, has so many erasures and corrections in the names of occupiers that it is a confusing document to analyse.

Taking the 1685 Roll, then, it appears on a superficial glance that the numbers of households in each street are singularly near the totals of to-day. On the east side of the High Street there were 55 households; to-day there is actually the same number; on the west side there were 45 as against 51 to-day. On the north side of Sheep Street there were 9 as against 8 to-day, and on the south side 14 as against 20. On the north side of Witney Street there were 17 as against 25, and on the south side 8 as against 10. In Priory Lane and St. John's Street together there were 9, as against 16 in the modern Priory Lane, which covers the ground of both the older names. On Church Green there were exactly the same number of separate buildings as to-day, namely a house next the churchyard, the Almshouse, and a house at the Gildenford end of the Almshouse. Church Lane is a difficult point, because to-day almost the whole of it on both sides is School building; in 1685 there were seven households here. A few households are entered in Gildenford Lane, but the number is not specified; as they were all in the hands of John Castle, who later on gave six houses in the Lane for the purposes of an Almshouse, we may perhaps conclude that this would be the number of his tenements here on the 1685 Roll.

Now it is at first sight curious that the numbers of the separate houses should so nearly correspond with those of the present day. True, there has been no considerable increase of population. But general ideas of the closer quarters and more cramped way of living in the earlier period would lead us to expect that the houses nowadays would be more numerous, even if the population were much the same. The answer to this difficulty may be found on a little further analysis. To begin with, the apparent correspondence of the High Street figures needs modification. Several cottages lying back from the Street, like the row up an alley below the Post Office, would be entered under the burgage rent of the tenement on the back premises of which they had been constructed, and so would appear under the head of the High Street. Similarly some cottages which we should now describe as lying on the north side of Priory Lane, at the back of the Falkland Hall, would for the same reason appear in 1685 as High Street households. Again, no entries are made for Lawrence Lane, though there are houses there obviously older than the date of this Roll; they must have been classed with the High Street tenement behind which they stood. This is the first consideration which makes it necessary to subtract from the High Street totals of 1685. Another is that, although for general comparison we combined in the earlier figures the High Street and the Hill, it is also requisite to separate them for a proper view of the conditions then and now. In 1685 there were only ten houses on the Hill, five on the east, four on the west, and one not assigned on the Roll to either side. It is not quite easy, owing to lack of any definite indication of where the High Street ceased and the Hill began, to provide any corresponding figures from the town of to-day; but, roughly speaking, we may take it that where there were only ten houses in 1685 there are now about forty.

Adding to these considerations the fact that the modern figures give us five more houses in Sheep Street, ten more in Witney Street, and a number in Gildenford Lane, with perhaps two or three more in Priory Lane, we can see where the real change has been, behind the apparent similarity of the figures. Improved ideas of comfort and privacy have expanded the town outwards from an overcrowded central space to the side streets and the Hill. The High Street below the Witney Street and Sheep Street turnings must have been in 1685 a mixture of some rather large houses with huddled cottages between and behind them. Taking the total population of the town, on a basis of 180 households, as about 900, we find some 460, or rather more than half, living in that area.

It follows that we cannot yet picture the town as having attained quite its modern form. The Hill was as yet chiefly open ground with a few houses scattered up it; and there were some clear spaces on the south side of Sheep Street, and on the north side of Witney Street towards the river.

It is not possible to say exactly where the larger houses broke the frontage lines of the streets. On the east side of the High Street there were several. One, which paid burgage rent at the highest rate recorded on these Rolls, namely 9s., appears to have occupied the site of the present Wesleyan Chapel. Another, which paid 6s., probably stood just above this one. Three others on that side paid together 16s. Higher up on the same side a large house stood at the corner of the modern Swan Lane, its ground running back alongside the lane. It has a particular interest, because it is associated with the family of Warren Hastings. A document of 1648 shows that the ownership was partly vested in 'George Hastings of Dalford in the County of Worcester'.¹ When the messuage ceased, at some time between the two dates of these Rolls, to be a single residence, and was divided between three occupiers, one of them was Hercules Hastings.²

On the west side of the High Street there were fewer large houses. One mansion paid 6s., and another, held with some arable land, 8s. 8d.

In Sheep Street the largest house stood about in the middle of the south side. It appears from various indications to be the one formerly held by the Gild, with rather ample ground about it; and to have occupied the ground now covered by three houses and several gardens.

A few small details can be added to our mental picture of the town. Opposite the Tolsey stood the High Cross; it was, of course, standing there in earlier times, but the first actual mention of it is not before 1608. The base of it, dug up during a re-making of the roadway, now stands behind the Tolsey railing in Sheep Street. On the east side of the High Street was a forge known as 'Middle Forge'; it stood just below the Witney Street corner; on the west side was a pump.

² He was a clockmaker, some of his productions being still in existence. One is in the possession of Mr. John Lane.

Indications such as those which have assisted us in dating the buildings of earlier periods are not lacking in the later part of the seventeenth century. It is not, however, easy to assign definitely to the first half of this century any of our buildings. The most that can be said is that there are considerations which might assign to that time the building of the beautiful three-gabled, barge-boarded house on the west side of High Street, opposite the end of Sheep Street. Obviously this frontage involved a much freer use of glass for the windows of the upper storey than did the late sixteenth-century type. Yet as late as 1608 'the glass in the windows' was valuable enough in Burford to be separately scheduled in the sale of quite a large house.¹ Therefore the frontage which has just been mentioned should probably be regarded as not earlier than 1625.

Of an early type of Jacobean structure we need hardly expect to find many examples. So much rebuilding had been done—so many substantial stone houses erected—in the Elizabethan period. Yet of course necessity is not the only cause of new building; it may equally be dictated by changing taste backed by easier means. When we find, as we shall shortly be finding, among the inhabitants of Burford a distinctly new kind of resident, we may, therefore, be prepared for the appearance also of a new kind of domestic architecture. Some houses bearing an inscribed date, which allow us to date others by their resemblance, prove that the latter half of the seventeenth century was almost as active a building period as the latter half of the previous century had been.

The front of the Vicarage towards the High Street bears the date 1672; a house in Sheep Street is inscribed 1696; and with these we may place the house at Kit's Quarries built, according to a stone let into the wall, by Christopher Kempster in 1698. In these three, different as they are in general outline, we can discern certain common characteristics. They have stone fronts of more carefully worked ashlar than the earlier houses had, extremely well fitted and pointed. The window openings are plain with a broad shallow moulding outlining them, and are tall in proportion to their width ; they are very distinctly designed for sash windows. The whole effect is of a smoother, more refined style, with a tendency to rectangular outline and to a great restraint in taste.

Two houses almost opposite the Vicarage, obviously built at one time and included under one roof-line—perhaps for economy in labour—display the same characteristics ; and so does a house higher up the street on the same side, a little above the Wesleyan Chapel.

We may without much hesitation assign to about this period the building on the south side of Witney Street now called the Great House. It has the same kind of window opening, varied with pleasing circles in the uppermost storey and oval lights for the cellar ; and the same good ashlar stonework. Other decorative details, such as the large pine-cone ornaments, the pedimented frontage and the castellated turrets, are not unsuitable to so high a façade. This may perhaps be the building which appears for the first time on the Burgage Rent Roll of 1685 as part of Mr. Robert Glyn's land—' a new tenement on the south side of Witney Street in the possession of the said Robert Glyn '.

There is reason, too, for classing among our late Jacobean buildings the present frontage of the Bull. In the Burford Records is a lease of the Bull to Edmund Heminge, dated October 13, 1658. The house is described as ' now in his tenure ', but the new lease is not to begin until October 18, 1661, and then the rent is to be raised from £6 a year to £14 a year, with an increased chief rent to the lord of the manor which the lessee covenants to pay. The post-dating of the new lease has one obvious explanation ; the existing lease of the premises, granted in 1630, was not due to expire before 1661. But there are some facts which require further explanation. Heminge was already in possession, and had no need to anticipate by so long a time the end of his tenure. The new lease imposes a very heavy advance of rent, which is the more striking because, after the Commission of 1628 had fixed the fair rents for the charity properties, the practice of the Burgesses was to maintain them at the same figures, even when, in justice to the charities, they ought to have been advanced to keep pace with increasing wealth. An explanation which would meet these facts, and would at the same time be not discordant with the style of the Bull frontage, is that the interval of three years prescribed in Heminge's new lease may very likely have been arranged to allow for the rebuilding of the inn, after which it would, of course, be rented more highly.

PLATE XII. THE GREAT HOUSE

This opens the way to an interesting conjecture. The Bull frontage is remarkable as being the single instance of a considerable use of brick in Burford architecture¹—a very successful use of it, for the structure is in no way displeasing, though so uncompromising a departure from the natural building material of the district. But why should brick have been used at all? The answer may be found in certain circumstances of Burford life at this time. The current of road traffic and travellers, which was later to become its chief business, was beginning to flow into the town. A project for rebuilding the Bull may easily have arisen from the idea that more than one good inn might profitably be kept here, and that a rival to the George might stand a good chance of success. If so, it may not be straining the point too far to suggest that the unusual recourse to brick may have been due to a deliberate intention to be striking, and even, considering the great beauty and distinction which brick building attained in later Jacobean architecture, to be fashionable and up to date. In other words, the one brick façade in Burford may be an early instance of the use of advertisement.

That new element in the population, to the presence of which we may attribute the building activities of this period, is singled out on the Burgage Rent Rolls by a curious little distinguishing mark. A certain number of the chief tenants are entered with the title 'Mr.', an obvious indication that they were persons of consequence. It is clear from the use of this title that Mr. Highlord, Mr. John Jordan, Mr. Robert Glyn, Mr. Heylin, Mr. Templer, Mr. William Elstone, Mr. Robert Pleydall, Mr. Robert Veysey, ranked as of a different station even from men like the Bartholomews, the Taylors, the Silvesters, the Webbes, and so on, who, though there can have been little difference in wealth, are not endowed with any formal title. A group of residents is thus seen growing up in the town somewhere between the few who were, in those more accurate days, entitled to be addressed as 'Esquire'—like the Lenthalls or the Duttons—and the traditional Burgess families. It is the beginning of an upper middle class in Burford, to be increased in time by the physicians, like John Castle, and the lawyers, like the Randolphs.

We can discern some families of the townsfolk on the way from one classification to the other. Though the Burgage Rent Rolls do not explicitly recognize their status, the Bartholomews, some of the Silvesters, and a few more are in some documents described as 'gentlemen'; and in such cases as the references to 'William Webbe the younger, of Clifford's Inn, London, gentleman, son of William Webbe, of Burford, yeoman', and 'William Hunt, of New College, in the University of Oxford, gentleman, son of John Hunt, of Burford, mercer', the process of rising in the world was evidently being assisted by departure from the town.

But the distinct position of the group of residents to whose names the title 'Mr.' is prefixed is for the moment sharply defined, and even emphasized, by the fact that none of them ever appears among the Burgesses. There can have been no great social distinction to account for this. Mr. Highlord's ancestry, within two or three generations, took him back to London tradesmen;¹ Mr. John Jordan, though a man of property who ultimately became lord of a manor (that of Black Bourton),² was at this time Steward to the Lenthalls, and several of his name were in trade in Burford. Such men can hardly have held their heads higher than the Bartholomews, who were Burgesses. The only conclusion open to us is that the new group ranked essentially as men of comfortable means and leisured independence, and were for that reason outside the circle of the tradespeople.

They are our representatives of a class that was, of course, increasing greatly in numbers all over England. A better understanding of the principles of currency, combined with the enormous addition to the stock of precious metals which the discoveries and conquests of the sixteenth century had brought about, had spread, through innumerable channels of domestic trade the prosperity accruing from the expansion of foreign mercantile adventure. At the same time improved education, the multiplication of books, and an advancing standard of comfort were adding attractiveness to the leisure thus rendered possible. Men not of noble or gentle birth could, if they chose, find for themselves in social life a pleasant place which neither shackled them to affairs nor involved them in aping their betters.

In most towns the mild sophistication of life which this new class was producing must have been evident at this period. In Burford it may well have been hastened by the fact that the situation of the town in relation to the routes of travel, which has already been seen to have so much importance in our history, was again about to become an active factor in its development. The ridge of hill above the town south-east of the Windrush valley lies along the shortest practicable route from Oxford to Cheltenham, on the way to Gloucester and the crossing of the Severn into Wales. There is one curious little sign in the Burford Records of the traffic along this route, namely, the frequent occurrence of Welsh names in grants and leases of the sixteenth century. John Griffith, Hugh Owen, Griffith Jones, William Hughes, John Lloyd, William Roberts, John Jones, John Williams, Owen Thomas, John Lyme alias Jenkins, David Hewes alias Lloyd, George Watkyns, Evans Lloyd, Griffith Lewis—all these are found among the Burford residents of that century, and some of them became Burgesses. This striking incursion of Welsh names is enough to show that the road which was ultimately to be one of the great coach roads of England, the road between London and South Wales by way of Gloucester, was even then much in use.

As yet, however, the road just at this point was not of first-rate importance. Direct traffic from London to Gloucester followed a line south of the Thames, crossing the river at Lechlade.¹ But at that period, before the development of the through coaching systems, the wide difference between a main road and a by-road, a coach road and a posting road, had not arisen. The posting system was all that had been organized; and that Burford had already taken its place in that system is sufficiently indicated by the fact that so early as 1685 there is a reference to 'the postmaster' at Burford.² The town's main activity as a posting station came, not from the Oxford–Cheltenham–Gloucester route, which was later to be its chief artery of life, but from its situation on the road to Stow-on-the-Wold, a junction line between the southern and midland through routes.

One other point of difference between the roads of this and later periods may also be noted. The normal way from Oxford to Burford did not at this time lie through Botley and Eynsham to Witney, but took the less direct course by Bladon, Long Handborough, and the northern side of Eynsham Park. That was the direction taken by Charles I on his night march out of Oxford; and he would hardly have taken it if there had been a good road through Eynsham, since this latter route would have kept him farther away from Essex at Bletchington, while bringing him very little nearer to Waller at Newbridge. But a more significant proof of the old lie of the road, because one connected with an ordinary journey and uncomplicated by considerations of tactics, is the fact that Charles II, returning from the races at Burford, and hawking on the way home, finally entered his coach at Campsfield, which is upon the road between Oxford and Bladon.³

Burford Races can claim a very early place in the records of organized race-meetings. The history of the sport, as we know it now in England, may be said to have begun with James I. Horses have been raced against each other, of course, since men first learned to ride them; and races arranged more or less on the moment were constantly taking place at English fairs and festivities. But not until the reign of James I do we come upon race-meetings as a pastime, or upon challenge trophies (usually in those days gold or silver bells) held for a year and then raced for again on the same course. Races of this kind date from 1603 at York, and 1609 on the Roodee at Chester; while subscription purses are first mentioned in 1613.¹

Hence a record of racing at Burford in 1620 gives the town an early place in the annals of the sport. The parish registers contain the following entry, among the burials:

And in 1626:

William Backster gent. sometyme of Norfolk and in that sheir borne and now belonging to the Lord Morden was slaine at the George the next daie after the race and buried the 6 of November.

Since it was without doubt the personal passion of James I for the sport that brought horse-racing into fashion in English life, it seems not far-fetched to conjecture that on his visit to Sir Lawrence Tanfield in 1603² he may have perceived that Burford Downs would form an excellent Course, and may have helped to establish the meeting. That, from the first, it was a fully organized meeting we may conclude from the form of the Register entries and the use of the term 'the race'.

William Howard servant to Mr. Rowland Lacy received a wound at the race and died thereof and was buried the 10 day of Aprill.

In 1680/1 the race for the King's Plate was transferred from Newmarket to Burford.³ Charles II was at Oxford that year, and he came over to witness the races on March 17, being received by the Bailiffs and Burgesses and conducted by them to the Priory, where he dined before proceeding to 'the large plain adjoining' for the races. The company at the meeting, Anthony Wood tells us, was larger than at any time on Newmarket Heath;¹ but, on the other hand, the racing, according to one of the Duke of Ormonde's correspondents, was inferior. The King agreed in this verdict; but he liked the hawking here better than at Newmarket. He had some sport of that kind before the races; when he arrived at Burford his famous huntsman, Will Chiffinch, met him 'with his little devil black beagles and his hawks; but to show his Majesty's partiality to the latter, though the former brought their new started hare into his view, he cried let them go and went a-hawking'. The country was evidently as good a hare country then as it is now.

In spite of the Royal opinion Burford Races were to continue for over a century longer. This meeting that Charles II attended was a spring one; Register entries already quoted show that a meeting was held in November; and an entry of the year 1630—'Mr. William Clarke, servant to the Lord Grey, killed by a fall from his horse at the race meeting June 8'—gives us a summer meeting also.

Burford racing was discontinued at the beginning of the nineteenth century. The site of the Course can be identified still by remains of some buildings in a small wood, close to the road on the way from Burford to Bibury, about a mile before Aldsworth. These buildings are obviously remains of a grand-stand and stables.

Races to which the King came, races which attracted a larger company of rank and fashion than Newmarket, must have meant busy days in the town, the inns full, the streets alive with comings and goings. Whether this was quite salutary for Burford is another question. It may have had an ill effect in flooding the place with easily earned money, and introducing a certain parasitic habit, likely to sap the steadiness of trade. It is significant that the industry specially noted by Dr. Plot as characteristic of Burford in 1675 was malting. Inns begin to appear in the Records in astonishing numbers. Besides the old signs of the George, the Bull, the Bear, the Angel, and the Crown, we find the Greyhound (then at the corner of what is now Swan Lane), the Swan (which occupied Cob Hall between the Vicarage and the river), the King's Arms, the Mermaid, the Three Goats' Heads, the Blackamoor's Head, the Three Cups, the Black Boy, the Talbot, the White Hart. No doubt they all did a good trade; but we may entertain the suspicion that Burford's activities at this time were often more in the nature of bustle than genuine business.

There was, indeed, one trade here as important as malting; the Burford saddlers had a great reputation. The first glimpse of this may perhaps be found in the letter, previously quoted, from Thomas Cade to Thomas Cromwell, recommending as a suitable applicant for a lease of some Crown property a Burford clothier named Tucker. Cade clinches recommendations of various kinds by the promise: 'And he schall gyf yow xx^{ti}/_{li}. to by yow a sadell.'¹ It is not said that the saddle should be a Burford one; but the choice of this particular article for the offering may well mean that it was beginning to be the town's best product. It certainly was so in 1663, when three saddles were presented to Charles II and the Duke of York, at a cost of £21; in 1680/1, when Charles was given another, which, Anthony Wood says, was a finer present than Oxford had made to the King;² and in 1695, when two were given to William III, which he ordered to be reserved for his own personal use. The tanners, curriers, smiths, and collar-makers, whom we find also among the tradesmen of the time, reveal a general harness-making industry such as would naturally flourish in a posting town.

But though the Burford saddlers for a time rivalled in reputation (and in more belligerent ways) the Witney blanket-makers, Burford never devoted itself in the same degree as

Witney to one staple trade. Broadweavers, fullers, a felt-maker kept the more ancient occupations alive to some extent. Masons, joiners, carpenters, and a brazier got their living from the taste for improved housing and the command of easier incomes.

For the rest, the trade of the town tended more and more towards general shop-keeping. This is to be expected both from the posting traffic through the place, and from the demands of that leisured class which we have seen appearing among the inhabitants. Mercers, haberdashers, tailors, bakers, and so on are as common among the Burgesses as are tanners. Barber surgeons, a physician, and an apothecary or two had found it worth while to set up in business. But the most interesting sign of the rising social outlook of Burford is that there was already a bookseller's shop.

In fact, the doubt whether this was really Burford's most prosperous time is suggested rather by the quality of its trade than by the volume of it, which in a miscellaneous way must have been larger than ever. It sufficed to maintain Burgesses like Leonard Mills, Simon Simons, the Silvesters, John Hannes, in big comfortable houses; to establish the Bartholomews in the manor house on Westhall Hill; and to send the scions of the Webbes, the Hunts, and the Jordans forth into the world as gentlemen. In these families we discern the successors of what might be called the 'forty-pound group' of Tudor times; and in the Sessions, the Serrells, the Taylors, the Yates, and so on we can equally discern the 'twenty-pound group'. It is difficult, after the view we have had of these men in their public capacity as a rather discredited Corporation, to observe them without bias in their capacity as tradesmen. But in so far as they can thus be seen, they show no sign in their business of the blight that had fallen upon them in larger affairs.

This is the period when, in Burford as elsewhere, trade was assisted by the use of a local currency—the tradesmen's tokens. There are nine known Burford tokens, as follows:

Of the eighteenth century our Records have very little to tell beyond the range of the controversy that arose in 1738 and was prolonged till 1743 over the administration of the charities. That has been fully discussed elsewhere.

Richard Rawlinson was here in 1717, in the course of collecting the notes which were to have been the foundation of his projected History of Oxfordshire. But his manuscript tells us little. He devoted himself chiefly to the monumental inscriptions in the Church, using largely the notes of the 1660 visitor; incidentally he mentions that the inscription by John Leggere outside the south transept window¹ had then been re-cut 'by Mr. Silvester'.² He makes, however, one important statement. 'In 1645', he writes, 'Sir W^m Waller demolished the Cross, which stood upon eight pillars was the third for beauty in England, the vase stands now on a neighbours house near adjoining.'³ This would appear to refer to the Tolsey. The date 1645 is perhaps a mistake for 1644, in June of which year Waller was here for several days;⁴ it may be suggested that the few Royalist soldiers he caught in the town had attempted to hold the Tolsey, and so brought about this demolition.

Rawlinson also records the holding of the Assizes at Burford in 1636, on account of the plague then raging in Oxford; and he adds that the condemned persons, three men and a boy, 'all of the name of Thomas', were hanged on Battle Edge. One of the bodies was dissected by Mr. William Taylor, and Rawlinson saw the skeleton, then in the possession of Mr. Taylor's grandson, a surgeon, of Burford.

From every point of view little is to be expected of this period in the way of notable additions to the town's buildings. Yet there is a type of house which is probably to be attributed to the early eighteenth century. The best specimen is the fine tall-windowed façade opposite the Tolsey. We cannot date it with the accuracy which has been possible in the case of types of other periods; but the great height of the windows and the character of the woodwork in them are enough to give an approximate date. The marked feature of the style is that the frontage is carried up to a more or less emphatic parapet, throwing the roof back into a position of minor importance. This feature had, indeed, found a place earlier in some houses; the façade of the Vicarage and that of the Great House display it. But both of these are cases in which the parapet is an ornate detail of a decoratively treated frontage. They are not quite on the same level as the cases in which the parapet is the governing characteristic of the design of small façades, as in the present Post Office, or a house, lower down on the opposite side of the High Street, in the block between Church Lane and Lawrence Lane, or, on a rather bigger scale, the house on the south side of Sheep Street to which the sign of the Greyhound was removed in the eighteenth century. Several houses on the Hill are also of this type.

Apart from these recognizable structures, this period must be responsible for a great deal of entirely featureless building, which filled the gaps in the street frontage lines, and so allowed a little more elbow-room to the population. For two maps of the end of the century make it quite clear that by that time the streets had come to present virtually the unbroken appearance that we have to-day. One is the map engraved by Davis of Lewknor in 1797, but based on surveys made in 1793; and the other is the map of 1823, drawn, as there is reason to conclude, from the Enclosure Award Map of 1795. Neither is on a large scale; yet the scale is sufficient to have shown any considerable gaps in the street lines, and none are to be seen. We may therefore take it that much of the building work of the century was given to squeezing in, between existing houses, cottages and small houses to accommodate the larger population of the time. For the first of the modern census returns, made in 1801, shows that by the end of the eighteenth century there were not less than 1,500 persons in the town.

Probably the chief part of the increase in population occurred in the last quarter of the century, with the advent of the great days of coach travelling. Until the middle of the century Burford was relying on its trade as a posting station. Even the 1749 edition of Ogilby represents the through road to Gloucester as still passing south of the Thames; and in a Road Improvement Act of 1751 the route in which the Bailiffs of Burford are officially interested is one that leads in the old way by Campsfield. But a change was by this time close at hand. In 1761 a coach began running from Burford to London by way of Witney; the enterprise was undertaken by Thomas Castell.

Thus was opened the road along which the remunerative traffic of the next sixty or seventy years was to pour through Burford. It is probable that better methods of road-making, combined with better drainage of the fields, had rendered practicable all the year round the rather low-lying stretch between Oxford and Eynsham. This was all that had been needed to bring the Gloucester, South Wales, and Hereford traffic down from London by way of the Chilterns, Oxford, Burford, and Cheltenham, instead of by the roads south of the Thames, which would be served by the Bath and south-western coaches. In the fierce competition that was now beginning the new route offered an ample prospect of profit.

Burford's interest in the coach traffic was even greater than might appear at first sight to the traveller of to-day; for the modern main road really passes the town by, keeping to the ridge of the hill. But during the longer part of the coaching period there was no proper road along the ridge at this point; there was only a farm track serving for the work on the arable fields. The main road, directly it entered the parish of Burford at the eastern boundary, left the ridge and turned down White Hill, to come right into the town by way of Witney Street. It left the town again by way of Sheep Street, at the end of which it took a turn down through the Priory woods, towards the river, to rise steeply from the farther corner of the woods up past Upton quarries to the top of the hill once more, not far from the western boundary of the parish. Of this curious deflection towards the river the traces can still be seen. Inside the modern wall of the Priory grounds just beyond the Lamb Inn there runs a short length of the older wall, going off at a slant inwards; and beyond the woods the deep indentation of the old road in the hollow is perfectly plain.

PLATE XIII. THE BULL

For a long while, even after Palmer's reforms of the coaching system and the great speeding-up that he effected, the coaches continued to come thus into the heart of the town ; and the business they brought must have been considerable. True, the coaches probably did not make any long stop here ; Witney seems to have been the stage for changing horses, and the passengers would take their chief meals either at Oxford or at Cheltenham. Much the most profitable business in Burford must have been done with those who came in from the country-side to catch the through coaches here. That often involved a stay of more than one night, for coaches might come in fully loaded and unable to take more passengers ; there was then nothing to be done but wait until a later coach came in with a vacant seat. Moreover, the posting business, though no longer the chief trade, must still have been valuable.

It has been calculated that in the best time Burford saw no fewer than forty coaches passing up and down in the course of the twenty-four hours. From the reminiscences of an old coaching guard on this route we know the names of some of the ' fliers ', and can calculate the hours at which they passed Burford.¹ About 9.30 in the morning the Magnet from Cheltenham would arrive, on its way to Oxford, and just behind it came the Berkeley Hunt, a green coach, working the same route. At 11 the Regulator from Gloucester would rattle in, and with it, or on its heels, the Retaliator, also from Gloucester. At 1 o'clock the Mazeppa from Hereford and its rival on the same road, the Rapid, would appear ; and soon after they had gone the down Magnet and the down Berkeley Hunt would be roaring up the narrow end of Witney Street. Later in the afternoon the down Regulator, Retaliator, Mazeppa, and Rapid were due ; and by 7 o'clock the first of the night coaches, the Champion from Hereford, came through, followed about 10.30 by the Paul Pry from Aberystwyth. At 12.30 a.m. the down Champion, and soon afterwards the down Paul Pry, would be waking the echoes. Last of all in the small hours came the Gloucester

Royal Mail, the up coach at 1.30 a.m. and the down at 4.30 a.m.

Thus, without counting the less important coaches and those working only short distances, eighteen of the through 'fliers' were seen here every day. The rows of hooks that are yet visible in the beams under the archways of the George and the Bull must always have been laden then with joints of beef, hams and hares and partridges; and the yards that are now so quiet can never have been without the clatter of the stable hands and the gossip of the post-boys.

What this constant touch with the world might mean to the more leisured class of Burford resident is seen in the correspondence between the ladies who lived in the Great House towards the end of the eighteenth century and their brother, 'Daddy' Crisp, the friend of Fanny Burney. The story of Mrs. Gast and her sister has been told by Dr. Hutton,¹ and all that need be said here is that it makes an interesting addition to the rather meagre picture of Burford life in general during this period.

Meanwhile the outward aspect of the place underwent the last of the great changes that made it as it is now. The enclosure of the old common arable lands swept away the open fields, and put in their place the walled fields and pastures of the modern landscape. This occurred here at a rather early date, the Upton fields being enclosed in 1773 and the Burford fields in 1795. Analysis of the Awards provides us with the explanation of this. In Burford Fields, out of some 1,100 acres enclosed, only about 300 went to independent farmers. John Lenthall and the Impropriator of the Rectorial tithes received the rest. We can perceive only two farms which were not held on tenancy from these two persons. One was White Hill farm, held by Mrs. Mary Legg, of which the farm-house was not the one now called by that name, but the one in the valley by the Widford road; and the other was apparently worked in partnership by two men named Finch and a Mrs. Tebbut. Some ten others are named in the Award, but only for insignificant allotments of two or three acres. Similarly in the Upton Award, which disposes of 803 acres, 720 acres went to the Lenthalls, and only one other person, Thomas Ansell, who received 41 acres, can be considered as a farmer.

It is, therefore, not difficult to understand why our enclosures took place early. Small farmers working their own land had almost disappeared. The new sources of prosperity had drawn back into the town the families of those who, in the sixteenth century, had first begun the creation of larger farms. They had been willing to be rid of their land, when Tanfield and the Lenthalls were putting together their estates, and had made way for the new race of tenant farmers.

Thus, as we leave the eighteenth century, our mental pictures, not only of Burford town, but of the country-side round it as well, have reached the last stage, and afford us already in all outward appearance the Burford of our own time.

The only topographical point in which change was yet to come was the direction of the main roads. It is strange that with all the amelioration of the coaching service and all the fierce competition in speed, so obvious an improvement as the avoiding of the descent into Burford, and the hill out again, should have been delayed so long as it was. A minor improvement took place early in the nineteenth century, when Mr. John Lenthall diverted the road beyond Sheep Street from its passage through the middle of the Priory woods, and gave the coaches a straight run to the hill by the quarries. This alteration, however, was due rather to his concern for the amenities of the Priory than to any intention to save the coaches a toilsome détour.

Not until 1812 do we hear of 'the new road', which, by a re-making of the old track along the ridge, linked up the road between the turning down by White Hill and the turning up by Upton Quarries, so that the coaches could keep on the top of the hill. Naturally there was no little complaint in Burford. For while passengers would still come to the town to join the coaches, much casual trade would undoubtedly be lost. When a new inn was built at the cross-roads at the top of the town, the Bird-in-Hand—a somewhat gaunt house still surviving as two private houses—it may have seemed to portend a decline of the inns in the town ; especially when this was followed by the erection of another, the Ramping Cat, at the top of White Hill.

But a far more serious change was impending, which was to make anxiety about the new road of no account. Railroads were soon to divert the traffic of the country to wholly different lines of travel. For the principle of the new locomotion approached the problems of natural configuration in a way directly opposed to that dictated by the requirements of the coaches. Railways needed, not the dryness and firmness of the higher ground, but the most moderate gradients and the passage most nearly approximating to the level. The rise of the Cotswold could no longer be the best practical route to Gloucester and South Wales ; and on the other hand the valley of the Windrush lay just too far to the west to serve for the Worcester and Hereford route. Thus Burford found itself on none of the lines laid down by the Great Western Railway surveyors ; and, as the town had come to be very largely dependent upon chance traffic, not upon any well-developed industry, the blow must have been a heavy one.

But its effect was by no means immediate. Burford was still a market town, in a good agricultural district, and country folk were slow to avail themselves of the new locomotion in their business affairs. The evidence of the census figures throughout the nineteenth century is interesting. The figures are as follows :

Burford	1,516	1,342	1,409	1,620	1,644	1,593
Upton and Signett	209	242	277	246	—	—
	1861.	1871.	1881.	1891.	1901.
Burford	1,434	1,403	1,312	1,346	1,146
Upton and Signett	245	248	259	—	177

The Worcester section of the Great Western Railway was opened in 1852. For ten years before that there was little change in the population. The ten years after reduced it by about 10 per cent.; and the next twenty years brought it 20 per cent., below the highest point, which it had reached in 1841.

Population is not, of course, the only test of the effect of new conditions upon the town. There must undoubtedly have been less money in the place, when the coaching traffic ceased. But a very rapid ruin was averted by the inordinate prosperity of agriculture during the first sixty or seventy years of the nineteenth century. There were enterprising and skilful farmers around Burford; Mr. Turner of Burford, Mr. Tuckwell of Signett, and Mr. Pinnal of Westhall are constantly cited by Arthur Young, in his View of the Agriculture of Oxfordshire (1809), for the value of their opinions on farming methods, and their experience of cultivation and cropping. The steadiness of the figures of population in Upton and Signett are in their way an indication of the circumstances that had come to the rescue of Burford. Farming was flourishing, and the town's trade as a market and shopping centre for the villages around was just enough to pull it through the shock of the withdrawal of the road traffic.

Yet the market was doomed. As a generation grew up accustomed to railways, and forced at the same time by the decline of agricultural prices to seek the larger markets with their more various openings for business, places like Burford could not hold their own against the wider range of Oxford. There are men still living who can remember the 'market ordinary' room at the Bull, full on a Saturday of the farmers at their dinner. But in the late 'sixties of the last century the numbers were beginning to grow smaller, and in the early 'seventies the market flickered out; it never came to a formal end, but about the year 1873 or 1874 it ceased from mere inanition.

One fair remains, a shadow of its former self; it is held on September 25, and is the old Holyrood fair, granted to the town by Henry VII. The fair of St. John the Baptist, which was a much older grant, was still represented in 1861 by a fair on July 5 for horses, sheep, and cows.

Saved as it had been for the time by agricultural prosperity Burford shared to the full in the effects of the great agricultural depression. After 1871 the population fell heavily, until by the end of the century both the town and the agricultural hamlets were left with no more than two-thirds of the population of 1841.

What was probably the last hope of a vigorous trade revival was offered by a project in the year 1864 for a branch line connecting the Midland Railway with the south-west of England, passing close to Burford on the south. But in the end a different route was chosen, and there is now no likelihood of any conjunction of through routes which would bring the railroad to the town.

Yet by a curious turn of the wheel of circumstance this final reaction upon the town of its natural situation has not been wholly disastrous. Modern refinements of taste, quickened by revolt against the dreariness of conditions in huge modern towns, have taught a keen appreciation of the country-side, keenest of all for the spots preserved by their remoteness from the activities that unheedingly spread ugliness elsewhere. Moreover, mechanical inventiveness, which a hundred years ago was all in the direction of draining life away from the roads to the railways, is now, by motor cars, restoring it to the roads.

The tale told by the census figures was for many years written also in empty houses declining into ruin. There are empty houses still, but there are many, like the Priory itself, which have taken on a new lease of life. A new resident element in the population, as in the seventeenth century, an influx of road travel, as in the eighteenth century, at least prevent this topographical study of Burford from ending on a note of irremediable decline.

There are towns in England, like Winchester, which have never been off the lines of human movement and intercourse since first such lines are traceable at all. There are others, like Stamford, which were always in older days upon great routes of travel, and were cast suddenly from their importance by the advent of the railways; and others, again, like Swindon, which were as suddenly flung up into importance out of complete obscurity. Burford belongs to a class in some ways more interesting than any of these. Its relation to the routes of traffic has varied so much at different times that its topography is an unusually fascinating theme to pursue, and not the less fascinating because, in the face of modern valuations and modern appreciations, the final chapter is not yet written.

The fact that Burford was the scene of the dramatic climax of the mutiny among the Parliamentary troops in 1649 may justify, in a history of Burford, a more particular examination of that affair than histories of the period at large can give. These treat, indeed, of the general aspects of the mutiny, and its place in the political history of the time ; but they cannot give space to the movements of troops on either side, or to details which reveal how the sudden end was achieved —points which in their ultimate association with Burford become of great interest. Moreover an opportunity is thus afforded of investigating the complaint, made afterwards by some of the mutineers, that Fairfax and Cromwell had surprised them by deliberate treachery, and had in fact been false to their own pledged word. Even if the investigation throws no new light upon Cromwell, nothing that concerns his character can be negligible.

The mutiny of 1649 was part of that extremist agitation which, as we can now see, grew so inevitably out of principles which the Parliamentary movement developed, yet was so alien to the minds of the Parliamentary leaders. We are familiar enough in our own day with democratic activities to be well acquainted with the types of mind that they may inflammé—the irreconcilable doctrinaire, the unbending asserter of first principles against practical necessities, the man who can see no reason whatever for stopping short of the logical conclusion. These were the types that, after the final defeat of Charles I, had no patience with the Parliament's attempt to occupy the place he had left vacant, and could see in it only the substitution of one tyranny for another. By themselves they might have been, though troublesome, not very dangerous; the danger came from the alliance between this kind of opposition to the Parliament and the Army's growing suspicion of the politicians, with their adherence to old constitutional forms. A third, and the most powerful, factor in the situation, was that Parliament for the most part represented the Presbyterian tendency towards a new religious intolerance, a new attempt to enforce conformity, against which Cromwell threw his whole weight. Those who believed the Parliament was merely substituting itself for Charles were reinforced by those who saw it also substituting itself for Laud; and by Cromwell's attitude the Army's mistrust of the Parliament took a double edge.

As early as 1647 the first crisis had occurred, and the Army had asserted its authority in a way that must be referred to here, because it is constantly prominent in the events which culminated at Burford. The Parliament, envisaging its perils, and not unaware of the real seat of danger, had made an unwise attempt to disband a large part of the Army. The counter-stroke was a general rendezvous of the Army on Newmarket Heath, on June 5, 1647, followed within a few days by another at Thriplow Heath, near Royston,¹ at which the Army entered into an engagement to tolerate no disbanding or dividing until they saw the affairs of the country in a posture which they believed they had fought to secure. 'All wise men may see', they said in one manifesto, 'that Parliament privileges as well as Royal prerogative may be perverted or abused to the destruction of those greater ends for whose protection and preservation they were intended, to wit, the rights and privileges of the people and the safety of the whole'.¹ The ideally democratic settlement of the country was set forth in these engagements; and a Council of the Army was appointed, on which two representatives of the rank and file of each regiment were to sit as equals with officers and the higher command. Fairfax and Cromwell had countenanced these proceedings; Ireton and Lambert were known to have lent their legal training to the drawing up of the published Declarations.²

There is no reason for supposing that Cromwell at any time regarded the political spirit in the Army as a weapon which he could use against the Parliament and drop at his convenience. He was probably under no illusions; yet he made three miscalculations. He did not realize the strength of the belief that the reign of pure democracy could arrive in a moment; he had no conception of the Council of the Army as a rival to Parliament in affairs of government; and he, in common with others, entirely missed the profound danger of the 'engagement' against disbanding or dividing. The fixed idea of countering the Parliament in that matter blinded every one concerned to the use that might be made of this engagement against the military commanders themselves, when detailing regiments for service. Within five months Cromwell was applying a drastic corrective to impatience, by the summary execution of a soldier in front of a disaffected regiment. That, and the renewed fighting of 1648, were effective for a time in keeping the Army in hand. But the logical democrats remained irreconcilably hostile; pamphlets poured forth in endless attack upon existing authority; Lilburne and three other leaders—Walwyn, Overton, and Prince—were clapped into the Tower, from which retreat they continued the most violent assaults upon the tyrant Cromwell. The name of 'Leveller' becomes almost as common in the varied periodical literature of those years as the name 'Anarchist' or 'Bolshevist' in our own day; and it is to be remarked that, like these later names, it was usually employed as a term of abuse and prejudice.¹ It was always repudiated by Lilburne and his followers, who strenuously denied that they had any intention of reducing all men to one level, or making any rough and ready redistribution of property. But a truly democratic government they never wearied of demanding; and there can be no question of the zeal with which they fomented discontent, wherever they found it. In the Army it was keen enough, the failure of the democratic Council of the Army, which had speedily declined into a committee of high officers only, being embittered by the standing grievance of pay in arrear, at a time when considerable grants of money were being made to military leaders.

In April 1649 a spark was set to the tinder by the decision for the campaign in Ireland, and the selection by lot of the regiments to proceed there on active service. The danger inherent in the Thriplow Heath engagement was now revealed. The leaders of disaffection could, and did, take the line that the preparations for the Irish campaign were a disguised attempt to break up centres of agitation in the Army—a 'dividing', such as they had undertaken not to tolerate. The inflammation came to a head simultaneously at Banbury and Salisbury. At the former town the disaffected men placed themselves under the leadership of one William Thompson, cornet of a regiment of horse, held a demonstration in force, and issued a declaration in the then common form against 'tyranny'. With this centre of trouble the troops at Salisbury were already in communication. Thompson's manifesto states : ' We do own and avow the late proceedings in Colonel Scroops, Colonel Harrisons, and Major General Skippon's Regiments, declared in their Resolutions published in print ; As one man Resolving to live and dy with them, in their and our just and mutual defence.'¹ Less under the domination of a single leader, the movement at Salisbury was evidently in numbers the more formidable. Near that place were quartered two of the regiments of horse upon whom the lot had fallen for Ireland—Commissary General Ireton's and Colonel Scroops. The story may here use the words of some of those who were ultimately taken prisoner at Burford :

Our old solemn Engagement at Newmarket and Triplo Heaths, June 5, 1647, with the manifold Declarations, Promises, and Protestations of the Army, in pursuance thereof, were all utterly declined and most perfidiously broken, and the whole fabrick of the Commonwealth fain into the grossest and vilest Tyranny that ever English men groaned under . . . which, with the consideration of the particular, most insufferable abuses and dis-satisfactions put upon us, moved us to an unanimous refusal to go . . . till full satisfaction and security were given to us, as Soldiers and Commoners, by a Councel of our own free Election. . . . Whereupon we drew up a Paper of some Reasons, by way of Declaration, concerning our said refusal, to deliver to our Colonel ; unto which, we all chearfully subscribed, with many of our Officers (especially Cornet Den, who then seemingly was extream forward in assisting us to effect our desires) which being delivered a day or two after, immediately our Officers called a Rendezvous near unto Salisbury, where they declared, That the General intended not to force us, but that we might either go or stay ; and so certifying our intents to stay, we were all drawn into the Town again, and the Colonel, with the rest of the Officers, full of discontent, threatened us the Souldiers ; and because we were all, or most of one minde, he termed our Unity a Combination, or Mutiny ; yet himself, upon our request to know, told us, That he could not assure us, that he would go. Which forementioned Paper, with a Letter, we sent to Commissary General Iretons Regiment, who took it so well, That they were immediately upon their march towards our quarters, to joyn with us.²

It may be remarked here that the permission to 'go or stay' was not so simple as it sounds, since it meant in practice to go or be disbanded, and struck upon another grievance; for it is asserted in this same pamphlet that men who took their discharge, with months of pay in arrear, received nothing but a few shillings for immediate needs and a certificate of the amount of pay due, which certificates they were forced by their poverty to sell at 3s. or 4s. in the £—the Parliament, they allege, being actually so mean as to employ agents of their own to buy back their own certificates at that price.

The officers took the obvious steps for stemming discontent in the ranks, but without avail.

After this all politike means . . . were put in practice to work us off from our Resolutions, as severing the Troops, and dealing with them apart . . . All these devices working nothing upon us (there being no satisfaction given to our just exceptions) our Colonel fell to violent threats, and commanded us to put our Horses in a Field two miles from our Quarters; which though at first we did, yet finding the bitterness of his spirit to encrease, and that upon his information, That the General, and Lieutenant General were preparing a force against us: what could we do less, than put our selves into the best posture we could to preserve our selves, which we immediately did (and in this no man was more forward, and violently earnest, than that perfidious Apostate, Cornet Den). . . . Hereupon our Officers leaving us, we chose new ones, and disposed of our Colours, and immediately drew up a Declaration . . . This Declaration was publicly read at our Rendezvous in Old Sarum, where four troops of Commissarie General Iretons met us, and unanimously assented to by both Regiments; whereupon our conjunction we advanced to Marlborough and so to Wantage.¹

The terms of the declaration we may see in a letter sent the same day to Fairfax:

May it please your Excellency A Proposition was made unto us for the service of Ireland, with a Declaration of your Excellencies pleasure, that it was lawfull for us to consent or deny, for no man was to be forced; although many of us were very willing to put our lives in our hands for that service, yet were we constrained to answer in the negative, in regard we did conceive it a breach of former ingagements, to suffer many of our fellow Souldiers, who could not go, to be disbanded without a competent pay in hand of their Arrears to carry them home, and inable them to follow their occupations : We perceive such a representation of the businesse hath been laid before your Excellency, rendring us so vile in your eyes, that the next Newes we heard was of Forces marching towards us, which hath put us upon an unusuall yet a necessary way for our owne preservation, least we should be destroyed before we could be heard to speake, to relinquish our Officers, and fly for our present safety. And now we do earnestly beseech your Excellency patiently to heare us, and to take us under your protection ; all that we require is the performance of our ingagement at Triploe Heath, and we shall promise never to depart from your Excellencies command, in anything which shall not be contrary to the said ingagement, professing our selves very sorry, that we should have no better esteem in your Excellencies judgement.¹

This was all very well, but to 'relinquish' officers, 'dispose of' colours, and leave quarters was mutiny. We may see now that Scroop and his officers had (as will happen in face of the disgrace of a mutiny) lost their tempers, and had not, perhaps, handled the situation with a calm discretion. But it may be doubted whether anything could have controlled the men then. Memories of the prompt execution at Ware in 1647 (and there had been another summary execution in London early in this same year of 1649) must have warned them that, however they formulated their grievances, Cromwell would not tolerate refusal of orders. By that time there was no course for them to take but the one they now attempted—to effect a junction with other forces of the disaffected. Banbury would clearly be their objective, for a brother of Cornet Thompson was among their number ; but believing that by taking Abingdon on the way they could pick up some troops of Harrison's regiment as well, they had directed their march first upon Wantage.

Their information that Fairfax and Cromwell were on the move was correct. News of the outbreak at Banbury had reached London on May 5 ; on May 7 it was known there that Scroop's regiment had refused duty, and on the next day that Ireton's men were with them.¹ On May 11 these two regiments left Salisbury, and on the evening of that day the news reached Fairfax and Cromwell in camp at Andover; it may have been brought by Scroop himself, since he was later given Fairfax's reply to the mutineers' letter, to carry to them. The first step taken by the Generals was to dispatch at once four officers, Major White, Captain Scotten, Captain Peverell, and Captain Bayley with a communication to the mutineers. Leaving Andover on the evening of the 11th, they rode through the night to Marlborough, and finding that the troops had already left that place they followed them to Wantage. This was on Saturday, the 12th. Discussion was postponed till the next morning, when a meeting was to be held at 10 o'clock at Stanford-in-the-Vale. The four officers for some reason did not appear there (possibly, if one may judge by some expressions in Major White's account, because Scroop arrived just then), and had again to follow the Levellers, who were on their way to Abingdon. Near that place a halt was called, at which White read the letter he had brought from Fairfax. With Scroop the men would have no dealings; they listened to what White had to say—mainly an appeal to them, backed by Fairfax's letter, to perceive the perils of disunion in the Army. But the letter, they said afterwards, 'took but little effect upon our Spirits'; they were set upon effecting the junction they wished to make, and marched on till they met the expected two troops of Harrison's men, to whom they read their declaration.

The two Troops being very willing to be satisfied in the lawfulness of the engagement, telling us they were marching to Thame, and the next morning we should know their resolutions: But as we were marching back againe, before we were half out of the field, we spied a party of horse, which it seemed was the Apostate Reynolds with his mercenary damme crew (such as in our hearing most desperately swore, That if the Devil would come from hell and give them a groat a day more than the State, they would fight for him against the Levellers or any others) well, upon this we drew out a Forlorne hope, and thereupon two troops of Colonel Harrisons marched with us towards them; they retreated towards New-bridge and kept it by force against us, but we unwilling to shed blood, or to be the original occasion of a new war (though they have often branded us with it as if we wholly sought it) but our actions did then clearly manifest the contrary; for we seeing Souldiers coming in a Hostile manner against us as aforesaid, did meet them, having forty or fifty of them at our mercy, and could have destroyed them, for we had them two miles from the foresaid bridge, but we did not then in the least offer them any violence, or diminish a hair of their heads, but let them go to their body againe, and withall marched to a Ford.¹

It is necessary to modify this account in some respects by comparing it with Major White's. He says:

Reports came that the Bridge was made good against them by Colonell Reynolds, with 200 Horse and a party of Dragoons, and that my Lord Generall was coming to fall upon them in the Reer; this news was strange to me and begat some heats amongst them, and put some upon resolution to Force the Bridge, and they tied up their cloaks and rode a Career with resolution to charge them, as far as I could perceive by their words and practice. I then made what hast I could to get before them, and to interpose between them to prevent hostility; but by the way I met with Major Abbot, who asked my opinion, whether it were best for them to keep the Bridge, or let them passe? I asked him whither he had command from my Lord soe to do, he answered he had; then said I, you are bound so to do, or els you may be hanged if you do not: then coming to Colonell Reynolds at the Bridge foot, I there read the Paper which I had written, the which I thought so reasonable, as by that means to put a stop to any furious resolutions, the parties were perswaded to decline force, and marched a mile up the river, and forded over.²

By this time it was growing late in the evening of Sunday, May 13, and the mutineers began to think about quarters for the night. They left the decision to two of their officers, Lieutenant Ray and Cornet Denne, who decided to march them by Bampton to Burford, which was reached about nine o'clock at night. They disposed themselves about Burford and in two neighbouring villages, and appear to have settled down without much apprehension. They were horribly surprised when, at midnight, troops poured into the town from two sides, overwhelmed desultory attempts at resistance, and finally imprisoned about three hundred and forty of them in the church. The remainder of the mutineers, who had numbered in all some nine hundred, had escaped, but the arms and horses of about eight hundred fell into the hands of Fairfax.¹ He and Cromwell had moved very swiftly, having covered between forty and fifty miles in the day, and they had actually been at Abingdon, having moved from Andover by Theal, when the mutineers were crossing just above Newbridge.² The entry into Burford was made by Colonel Reynolds with his horse, Colonel Okey with his dragoons, and Major Shelborn with a Buckinghamshire regiment of horse. Fairfax himself brought up a party in reserve, and Colonel Scroop had a command in the rear.³ Captain Fisher commanded the party that was sent round to enter the town from the other side—the Sheep Street approach, no doubt, since the main advance of a force coming up from Bampton would naturally be made along Witney Street.

The mutineers afterwards made accusations of treacherous dealings against Fairfax and Cromwell, asserting that they had been lulled by Major White into a false security, had been led to believe that time would be given them for negotiation, and that there was no intention of using force against them.

Being in treatie [says their own account] with the Commissioners, and having intelligence, that the General and Lt. General were upon their march towards us, many of us severall times, urged to Major White, and prest upon him, that he came to betray us, to which he replied, That the Generall and Lieutenant Generall had engaged their Honours not to engage against us in any Hostile manner till they had received our Answer. . . . the things contained in our engagement at Triplo-Heath, that himself with our consents drew up a Paper in Answer to the Generall for us . . . During the time of treaty, while the Commissioners thus assured us all security, one of them, to wit, Captain Scotten privately slipt from us, and two others, to wit, Captain Bayley and Peeverill left notes at every Town of our strength and condition, whilst Major White held us in hand, and told us, that if they fell upon us, he would stand between the bullets and us : So that when notice had been sufficiently given, and we with all the meanes that could be used, wrought into a secure condition at Burford, & after the setting of our Guard, which was commanded by Quarter-Master More who was thereupon appointed, by his Brother Traytor, Cornet Den (who himself) since his coming to London hath avowedly declared to Ma. W. W.¹ to this effect, that his beginning and continuing with the Burford Troops was out of premeditated and complotted designe, that so at last he might the easier bring on their destruction, holding all the time he was with them, correspondency with the Generalls creatures, which said Quarter-Master More after he had set the guard in this slight manner, and possest us with as much security as he could, and under the pretence of going to refresh himself and his horse, did most villanously and treacherously leave the guard without any Orders, and himself in person posted away to the Generals forces and brought them in upon us, marching in the head of them with his sword drawn against us ; And Quarter-Master More being afterward called Traitor by some of the Souldiers, Cap. Gotherd of Scroops Regiment made answer he was none, for that he did nothing but what he was sent to do ; so that most Treacherously, that same night the Generals forces came pouring on both sides of the Towne of Burford, where we had not beene above three houres, swearing Damme them and sink them, and violently fell upon us, and so by a fraudulent and Treacherous surprize defeated us, not expecting it during the Treatie, especially from them with whom we had joyned these seven yeares for the defence of Englands Liberties and Freedoms, and though divers of us had faire quarter promised us by Colonel Okey, Major Barton and the rest of the Officers there with them, as that not a hair of our heads should perish, yet did they suffer their souldiers to plunder us, strip us, and barbarously to use us, worse then Cavaliers.²

Rumours of treachery were also current in London circles unfriendly to Cromwell.

Oliver [says Mercurius Pragmaticus] having had a Taste of their Resolution given him in Hampshire about Alton (as Reynolds the Apostate had about Banbury) he gave them leisure to retreat out of Hampshire to joyn with their Friends in the County of Oxford, concluding his old engine, money, was like to bee more effectuall than force . . . Besides by the muttering and whispering of his men, he was not sure, whether they would engage unto Bloud against their Fellow Souldiers. And therefore having Spies and Intelligencers active among them, hee so ordered the matter, that their own Scouts betrayed them, and brought him on to surprise them.¹

It was in answer to this accusation that Major White wrote his account of what had happened. Both accounts were published some months after the event—that of the mutineers being dated August 20, and Major White's September 17. Moreover it has to be remembered that, if the mutineers wrote in the bitterness of their failure, White wrote in his defence, and therefore the latter must be read with no less careful criticism than the former. On the whole it is not difficult to see the truth behind the two accounts. White is certainly frank in his statements, and he gives the text of various communications. He begins by saying definitely that when he received Fairfax's letter, he was given instructions to use what meanes I thought expedient, according to my judgment and conscience, to produce a right understanding and procure a Union, to which Lieutenant General Cromwell added, that I should let them know, that although they sent Messengers to them, they would not follow with force at the heels ; which words my Lord Generall confirmed.

That is a perfectly clear assertion, and it conforms with White's account of his action at the moment of the surprise. He says :

About midnight, when the Papers were a drawing up by Cornet Den at my quarters, newes came in, that my Lord Generall and the Lieutenant Generall were at the Towns end with 2000 horse and dragoons, I then presently went forth in my slippers, and made what hast I could towards my Lord, to beg of his Excellency to prevent bloodshed, but hearing the pistolls firing very thick, I ran as fast as I could, till I was stayed by a troop of horse, who threatened to pistoll me, but after information I passed them, and went forward, till I met with a single Trooper of the Northamptonshire horse, which would be satisfied with no account, but vowed if I stirred further he would pistoll me : I was forc'd to return back, and perswaded him to go with me to his Lieutenant, to be dismissed from being his prisoner, and then betook myself to my Quarters till the fury was over.

No man not genuinely surprised and distressed would have run such risks in the dark and the turmoil, when any one rushing out from the town would be taken for an escaping Leveller.

The accounts on both sides are quite consistent with an explanation that does not involve actual treachery. Fairfax's first letter, and the verbal message sent by White, were given on the very first news of the action taken by Scroop's and Ireton's regiments. At that stage, all that had happened, while serious enough, had not passed beyond the possibility of negotiation. The troops had left their quarters, but from the fact that White and the other three were sent to Marlborough it is clear that Fairfax hoped to stop them there. This is put beyond question by a letter written from the camp at Andover on the Saturday : ' They ', says the writer, referring to the disaffected regiments, ' lay last night at Marlbury, within 14 miles of us : the Gen. hath sent to them Major White, and Captain Scot, Captain Peverell, with a letter requiring their obedience, which if they refuse, he tells them what they are to expect, we much wonder we hear nothing of them again, for we have expected an Answer from them this 4 houres '. The information given here as to the tenor of Fairfax's letter is correct. ' If you shall returne to your obedience ', he wrote in the communication carried by Major White, ' these mischiefs are not yet gone so far, but that they may be healed by your submission and acknowledgement ; if you pretend to have done this unlawfull act for just ends, when did I ever refuse you, in referring any just desire of the Armies to the Parliament? if you refuse this tender to you, I must and I shall through God's assistance, endeavour to reduce you by force to a just obedience.'¹ The key to the situation surely lies in the mutineers' fixed idea of joining with other disaffected forces. That, with a certain desperation which would be the natural result of having burned their boats, prevented them from perceiving clearly that to pursue their immediate object completely changed the situation from Fairfax's point of view; no sensible commander could have intended to be kept in play while his opponents joined forces. This was distinctly perceived by Fairfax's emissary officers. Major White says :

Then [i. e. after the halt for discussion near Abingdon] came Captain Modee and Lievtenant Pritchard with a Declaration from my Lord Generall, directed to me to communicate to them; but the Regiment being marched to joyn with some troops of Colonel Harrisons, it could not at present be communicated to the whole, but I read it to their Trustees and Officers, and delivered it to them to communicate; at which time they offered to dismisse us, unlesse we would grant, that persons should go from them to my Lord Generals forces with him, and that they might have liberty to speak to, and publish Papers among them: this motion was like the former, of desiring assurance my Lord should not fall upon them; things without our power, and exalting their party to stand in competition with my Lord; this much incensed Captain Scoten, and made him impatient to be gone, which I must needs say, I was unwilling so to do, before I had gotten the bottom of their desires and intentions, but Captain Scoten going away, I desired him to present things to my Lord Generall with an impartiall account, and how I had behaved myself among them, and to let my Lord Generall know, I should prove my selfe as faithful to him in that Businesse, as any Officer in the Army, and that at what time he should send for me, I would come to him, and however I would stay but a very little time with them, but did intreat him to beseech my Lord Generall, to call me away before any hostility was exercised.

There can be no doubt of the meaning of this passage; White and his companions regarded their mission as over when they saw the mutineers carrying out their plan, instead of remaining where they were for negotiations. Scoten actually went away; the message White sent back by him shows that he also thought he ought to go, but remained because he felt he could still be useful in continuing to try to bring the mutineers to terms. But he refused to give them any further assurances concerning Fairfax's intentions, or any further undertaking. We see a little more of his mind at a later stage; after the crossing of the river, on the road to Burford, he desired that they would not neglect the use of their intended means of safety for my being with them, and did likewise expresse a great deal of confidence, that my Lord Generall would not fall upon them, and not without ground for it.¹

In other words, he gave the mutineers fair warning that his continued presence did not mean that the original message from Fairfax and Cromwell was to be considered as applying in the existing circumstances. The confidence he expressed was not that the Generals were not in pursuit, but that they would not necessarily make an actual attack; he believed that the matter might pass without bloodshed. His surprise at the last moment was not because the Generals had followed, but because they had arrived so soon. Nor have we any reason to suppose that the Generals did mean to attack; on the contrary there is evidence of instructions to the troops making the entry into Burford that 'mercy should be tendered' to the mutineers, 'and in case they submitted, no hurt should be done to them';² there is also the mutineers' own assertion that Okey, Barton, and others offered quarter. But there was resistance. In part this was inevitable; men roused suddenly by the pouring in of troops would very likely be firing pistols before the offer of quarter could be made; and there would be confusion in the darkness. But there was at least one point of deliberate opposition; 'some refusing to surrender made good an inn out of which they made about sixteen shot; one of them was killed, and two or three of them wounded'. This seems to have been the work of an individual who did not belong to any of the revolted regiments, or at this moment to the Army at all, but was among the leading extremists, Colonel Eyres, one of Henry Martin's associates. Throughout he showed an inclination to violence which the rest tried to avoid, and it was he who instigated the fighting which White just averted at Newbridge.

Colonell Eyres [says one account] is now brought a prisoner to Oxford, to be tried for his life; Hee did in a high manner exasperate the Mutineers, and at Newbridge led the Forlorn Hope & would have charged Col. Reynold and Col. Okey, who made good the passe against him though they were but a handfull to their number; he with divers others was in that house where that man was killed of our party, and shot divers of our souldiers before they would yield.¹

The whole matter may perhaps be summed up in this way. We can feel a real sympathy for the mutineers, and that not only on the ground that they could hardly be expected to perceive clearly how their own action affected the validity of White's original message to them. They deserve sympathy also because at first they had not been very discreetly handled, but most of all (and this is an effectual criticism of Cromwell) because a night surprise of the kind that occurred could not possibly be a peaceful proceeding, whatever the Generals' intentions; Cromwell should certainly have known that, if he wanted the affair to end without bloodshed, he should not have poured his men into Burford at midnight. He could have waited, with his much superior force, till the morning. But that is easy to see at this distance of time; and it has to be remembered that all the information which had reached the Generals had reported the mutineers as 'high and peremptory'. In any case, this is a criticism of a different nature from a charge of underhand dealing.

The captured troops were imprisoned in the church from that Sunday midnight till the following Thursday morning, and in that fact, more than in the ultimate executions, we may see Cromwell's handling of the disaffection. He could, as earlier events had shown, order executions on the instant, when he chose to do so. He now waited three whole days and nights. He condemned the three hundred and forty to an interval of chill reflection and agonizing anxiety that must have been very effective for his purpose; and the relic of those three days on the font in Burford Church—the words ‘Antony Sedley prisner 1649’ cut upon the lead lining—is perhaps grimmer than has been generally realized. Colonel Harrison, Colonel Okey, and Colonel Scroop appear to have been sent in to the prisoners with a general sentence of death; this so struck them, that when they had their monies sent them to buy provisions, they all refused to accept of it, saying they must take care to provide for the Soul, and not for the Body, and many of them wept bitterly.¹

‘The humble Petition of the sad and heavy hearted prisoners remaining in the Church of Burford’ is submissive enough in its acknowledgement of the offence and its unconditional prayer for mercy even on ‘such detestable offenders’.² Fairfax and his Council of War were, in fact, already taking another decision; on the Tuesday two marked men, Denne and Thompson (the latter, no doubt, from his relationship to the ringleader at Banbury) were separately condemned to death;³ but the rest appear to have been kept in suspense till the Thursday. Of Cromwell himself during this interval we have two glimpses. One is given by Major White, who relates how, when he went to see Fairfax and report himself, the General asked about the mutineers and what they said of him, & whether I thought the business might have been composed? to which I answered, that they generally spoke well of his Excellency, & that I thought the Business might have been taken up without that breach; to these expressions the Lieutenant Generall discovered much dissatisfaction, and wondered I was not ashamed to inform my Lord things so ridiculous, as to talk of a composure.⁴

The other, a still more personal glimpse, is in a periodical, which, after stating that Lilburne and Thompson (the Banbury Cornet of horse) were regarded as the authors of the discontent in the Army, proceeds :

For so it appears by the Examinations of several Prisoners, insomuch that righteous Oliver vow'd (in the presence of all the Officers) at Burford, and bound it with a solemn Thump on the Table, either Lilburne or himself should perish for it.¹

Two others besides Denne and Thompson were in the end appointed to die, but we do not know how they were selected ; in some accounts both are spoken of as corporals, in others one is given no rank. Of the final scene there are several reports, agreeing, however, in details ; the following is the most vivid :

This day Coronet Thompson was brought into the Church-yard (the place of execution). Death was a great terror to him, as unto most. Some say he had hopes of a pardon, and therefore delivered something reflecting upon the legality of his engagement, and the just hand of God upon him ; But if he had they failed him. Corporal Perkins was the next, the place of death, and sight of his Executioners, was so far from altering his countenance or danting his spirit, That he seemed to smile upon both, and accompt it a great mercy, that he was to die for this quarrel ; and casting his eyes up to his Father and afterwards to his fellow-prisoners (who stood upon the Church-leads to see the execution) set his back against the wall, and bad the Executioners shoot ; and so died gallantly, as he had lived religiously. After him Master John Church was brought to the stake. He was as much supported by God, in this great agony, as the later ; for after he had pulled off his Dublet, he stretched out his Arms, and bad the Souldiers do their duties, looking them in the face, till they gave fire upon him, without the least kind of fear or terror.²

Another account adds some touches to the picture, expanding a little what Thompson said :

That it is just what did befall him, that God did not own the ways he went, that he had offended the Generall, and desired the prayers of the people, and told the souldiers that were appointed to shoot him, that when he held out his hand they should do their duties, and accordingly he was immediately after the sign given shot to death.

² The Moderate, no. 45.

This account mentions that Church, after pulling off his doublet, took his place 'a pretty distance from the wall', and confirms his lack of fear.¹

Denne was reprieved at the last moment :

After these 3 Cornet Den was brought to the place of execution, he exprest himself with much penitancy, and said that he was more worthy to dy than live, with much remorse of conscience for being an occasion to lead others into this way of mutiny, and disobedience. But immediately before the act of Execution, The General sent him a pardon.²

The mutineers afterwards were convinced, as will already have been seen in various quotations, that Denne had been a traitor to them throughout ; but it may be doubted whether this is based on more than the fact of his sudden reprieve, with the addition of their very natural dislike and contempt of the rather abject completeness with which he now went over to the other side. After the execution Cromwell had the mutineers back into the Church and there addressed them, 'and making', as the mutineers' own account says, 'his old manner of dissembling speeches, told us it was not they' (i. e. the officers who had offered quarter) 'that had saved our lives, but providence had so ordered it, and told us that he could not deny but that many of the things that we desired were good, and they intended to have many of them done, but we went in a mutinous way, and disobeyed the Generals Orders ; but withal he told us that we should not be put off with dishonourable terms, because we should not become a reproach to the common Enemie.'³ When Cromwell had had his say Denne was made to preach, and we are left in no doubt of what his fellows thought of him :

And to put an utter inconfidence and jealousie for ever amongst such upon all future engagements, they made that wretched Judas Den, to that end their pandor and slave . . . they enjoyne Den to preach Apostacy to us in the pulpit of Burford Church, to assert and plead the unlawfulness of our engagement, as much as before the lawfulness to vindicate, and justifie all those wicked and abominable proceedings of the Generall,

Lieutenant Generall and their Officers against us, howling and weeping like a Crocadile, and to make him a perfect Rogue and villain upon everlasting Record.¹

His voice was made to reach beyond the walls of Burford Church, for he had also to publish a pamphlet against the mutiny—a pamphlet which apparently he had begun to write while a prisoner in the Church. It is much more likely that we are to see in these facts the reason for his reprieve, than to look for them in any treachery at an earlier stage. His treachery would have been of very little use to Fairfax, whose officers had, as the mutineers found out, left word at various points to guide him. Major White says nothing to reflect upon Denne; and it seems probable that, if he had had traitorous designs throughout, he would not have been in the town at the end, but would have slipped out with Quarter-Master More. We may be content with the explanation that Cromwell wished for a recantation from the Levellers' own side, as a useful weapon (they admit its effect in producing 'an utter inconfidence' in such proceedings for the future), and perceived that Denne was the man to produce it. He had had some little reputation as a Puritan controversialist before the war; tracts are extant by him against infant baptism, and also tracts by orthodox clergymen confuting certain 'schismatic' sermons of his when curate of Pyrton in Hertfordshire.² Whatever explanation be given of his escape, he does not emerge as an heroic figure. Stories were told of his having ordered his winding sheet and coffin, on hearing of his condemnation, and this, accordingly as it was told by those who believed him to be a traitor or those who merely thought him a coward, appears as a disgusting hypocrisy or an ostentatious piece of abjectness.³ Even the most friendly version of the reprieve says: 'But though he said this to save his life, yet the two last executed could not have said it, though they were sure thereby to gain their freedom.' We need not, however, conclude that Denne's change of opinion was wholly to save his skin; two statements seem to reveal him as the type of advanced theorist who becomes frightened by the pace at which any strong course, once it is developed, drives forward those who are committed to it. 'Cornet Den', we read, 'did confesse that many of that party that were thus engaged with him, their hearts were so intraged, and full of bitternesse against the Parliament party, and all others that did not adhere unto them, that he did think in his conscience there would have bin greate cruelty used by these men, and that it was a blessed and happy hour they were surprized and prevented'; his own pamphlet takes much this line, and draws its lessons from the differences he alleges between the ostensible objects of the mutineers and the temper which action roused in them. Denne recovered in the end some measure of respect; he reappears in 1653 as a preacher held in esteem at Fenstanton, in Huntingdonshire, and later near Canterbury. But he remained no hero; some of his people, Quakers and a few Baptists who joined the Quakers in their refusal to take oaths, were imprisoned: 'Mr. Henry Denne came forward, and addressed his brethren in prison, endeavouring to show them that to take an oath is a lawful act, sanctioned by the word of God.' Prison once more was giving him a respect for authority.

The mutiny ended at Burford. Those who had escaped had warrants issued against them, and the magistrates in all neighbouring counties were warned; but we do not hear of any further trials or sentences. The remainder of the Burford prisoners were returned for a while to quarters near Devizes, to avoid disbanding them in poverty; but it is plain from their account that many were shortly disbanded. Colonel Reynolds, who had been so useful throughout, was sent on to Banbury with a force to deal with Cornet Thompson; Thompson's following was easily broken up, but he himself was determined not to be taken alive. He was pursued to a wood on the road to Wellingborough and there killed three men before a corporal, taking a musket charged with seven bullets, made an end of him, 'and there is an end of the Levellers' uproare'.

Our only local record is again to be found in the Registers, where, inserted on the top margin of a page (and the Vicar may well have been too agitated to make the entry at the time in the right place on the page) are the lines : ' three soldiers shot to death in Burford churchyard buried May 17.' Another entry : ' A soldier slaine at y^e Crowne buried y 15 of May ' perhaps identifies for us the actual scene of the resistance organized by Colonel Eyres. He, we have seen, made good an inn ; the Crown was at the corner of Sheep Street and the High Street, in the centre of the town, a very likely place for resistance, and it is recorded that a man was killed there, and that a man was killed in that resistance ; that a man was killed at the Crown seems to identify the spot. The Churchwardens' Accounts enter payments ' to Daniell Muncke and others for cleansing the Church when the Levellers were taken '. But this is all the record we have. We do not know where Fairfax and Cromwell stayed, but in a place where Speaker Lenthall had his house it may be taken for granted that that was the house they would occupy ; and it must have been there that Cromwell thumped on the table.

APPENDIX TO CHAPTER X

A few names of the prisoners have come down to us, besides those of the men who were executed and the name on the font. The copy of the petition from the Church, given in The Moderate, records these signatories : Hugh Hurst, Matthew Brown, John Roper, William Doegood, John Bishop, William Panck, William Orpin, John Cantloe, John Wilkinson, Thomas Atkins, and James Steel. Hugh Hurst was also one of the six signatories of the mutineers' own account of their proceedings, the others being John Wood, Humphry Marston, Robert Everard, William Hutchinson, and James Carpen.

A note is necessary as to the dates of the events. White's copy of the mutineers' first letter to Fairfax is dated May 13 ; this must certainly be a mistake for May 12, since Scroop arrived on the 13th with the answer, and Fairfax refers to the letter as ' of the 12 of this instant '. Again, two, at least, of the contemporary accounts state that the execution took place on Friday, May 18. But Cromwell was in Oxford (whither he went, with Fairfax, from Burford) on the night of Thursday, May 17. We may, therefore, rely upon the date of the burial as given in the Registers, and conclude that the execution took place on the Thursday morning.

Tradition points to the high wall enclosing the churchyard at the west end as the actual scene of the execution, and without regarding certain hollows in stones there as bullet-marks the tradition may well be accepted. We know that the rest of the mutineers were on the leads of the church (the account in the Declaration and Speeches says 'in the Church', but there are two definite statements against this), and so large a number could only have found room on the leads of the nave and Lady Chapel. In that case this wall is much the most likely place to have been chosen for the execution; but it has to be remembered that the churchyard must at that time have been much more enclosed than at present; otherwise there would have been no need to take down a wall to carry straw into the church (see p. 206). There may therefore have been a suitable wall farther to the south, between the churchyard and what are now the Grammar School buildings.

CHAPTER XI

THE HISTORY OF BURFORD PRIORY

OF the origin of the small Hospital of St. John at Burford, which towards the end of its existence was sometimes called the Priory, no record has yet been found. The history of it, so far as documentary evidence is concerned, begins with an entry in the Close Roll of 1226, recording a gift of firewood to the Master and Brethren from the Royal Forest of Wychwood.

This date, however, taken in conjunction with certain other circumstances, opens the way to a reasonable conjecture, concerning the foundation of the hospital. From an early period the presentation to the mastership is found to be in the hands of the lord of the manor. Thus in 1268, in the course of a dispute concerning the lands of the hospital in Fifield, the Vicar of Burford states that John Giffard (who was then holding the manor) was 'the patron of the hospital'.¹ Again in 1327 Robert le Glasiere was presented to the mastership by the King 'by reason of the lands of Hugh le Despenser being in the King's hands'.² In 1389 the King presented one of his clerks, William Donne;³ and that presentation took place during the minority of Thomas le Despenser. Now the most probable cause of the patronage being vested in the lord of the manor would be the foundation of the hospital by a lord of the manor; and it must moreover have been one who held the manor at some time previous to 1226. With that limitation, by far the most likely founder is to be discovered in William, Earl of Gloucester. He was a great benefactor to the Church and to religious foundations; and there is good reason for connecting his possessions at Burford with his benefactions. He founded Keynsham Abbey; and the rectory and advowson of Burford formed part of his original endowment of it. He may therefore be reasonably conjectured to have been also the benefactor to whom the Hospital of St. John owed its origin. The history of the manor after his death and before 1226 offers us no other probability as strong.

This is, however, but conjecture. All that can be definitely asserted of the beginnings of the hospital is that it was an independent foundation. It did not, as has sometimes been stated, belong to the Abbey of Keynsham. No evidence has ever been produced in support of that statement; and evidence against it is strong. There is, firstly, the fact that the Abbey did not present to the mastership; secondly, the fact that the stipend of the master is never entered on the Clerical Subsidies, as the Vicar of Burford's stipend was, among the benefices of Keynsham; thirdly, the fact that in Rentals, Surveys, and Particulars for Grants after the Dissolution of the Monasteries, the hospital appears quite independently and not as parcel of the possessions of Keynsham.

The hospital must have been small. At no time in its history did its revenue exceed £16 a year, which, when all allowance has been made for the different value of money, gives it but an insignificant place even in the class of pious foundations to which it belongs.

These were foundations essentially different from the great monastic and conventual houses; and by the very principle of their existence less likely to become powerful and wealthy. The monasteries, designed to maintain the service of God and the expression of worship and devotion, commanded the gifts of the faithful; and, being at the same time the only seats of learning and intellectual interest, were bound, in their communal life, to exert an enormous influence and attain a wide power. The hospitals, whose sole object was that relief of the poor and the sick which to the great monasteries was, so to speak, a matter of the crumbs from their table, had neither the conspicuousness of the monastic ideal nor the force of a large common life to assist them: their work, in times which had not embraced humanitarianism, was not greatly regarded for its own sake, and was on a small and rather perfunctory scale. 'Besides the poor and impotent', says Tanner, 'there generally were in the Hospitals two or three Religious, one to be Master or Prior, and one or two to be Chaplains or Confessors.'

Of such was the Hospital of St. John at Burford, Augustinian in its rule, according to Dugdale's Monasticon, as the great majority of hospitals were. The reference to the master and brethren in the Close Roll of 1226, and a few other references to the brethren in similar entries during the next few years, together with the statement in 1327, regarding the appointment in that year to the mastership—that it was made on the representation of the brethren—must not be taken to indicate any larger community than Tanner thus describes.

This would, in any case, be obvious from the exiguous character of the revenues. Of the original endowment of the hospital we know as little as we do of its founding. Apparently its most prosperous period was from the middle of the thirteenth to the end of the fourteenth century, and from the group of references in the Close Rolls of 1226, 1231, 1232, 1233, and 1235, which all record gifts of firewood, we may perhaps conclude that at that time the hospital had very little landed property from which it could cut its own wood. After 1235 no more gifts of this kind are entered; and it is to be remarked that within a very few years the hospital appears in possession of a fair amount of land. This may not be more than an accidental coincidence. In 1260-1 there is record of a gift of a messuage and a virgate of land in Fifield;¹ and in 1279 the Prior is found in free tenancy in the same place of two holdings of 36 acres and 9 acres respectively, and also of ten virgates, of which he had five and a quarter in demesne.² In 1291 the hospital also possessed land at Rissington, which seems from later particulars to have been one virgate with certain meadow and pasture lands.³ In 1320 Joan, widow of Richard de Cornwall, gave to the hospital five messuages, four crofts, two virgates of land, and 10s. of annual rent in Asthall and Asthally.⁴

Unfortunately we have no information as to the property

of the hospital in Burford at this time. The absence of any Burford return in the Hundred Rolls is chiefly responsible for this lack, but it is due also to the fact that, as an institution for the poor and the sick, the hospital was not assessed in the Taxatio Ecclesiastica of 1291. It is true we owe to that Subsidy the knowledge of the lands at Rissington, but a note appended to the entry explains this accidental circumstance.¹ No other reference to the hospital is to be found there. At the same time, we have clear proof that it did possess property in Burford in the entry of the Master of the Hospital on the Subsidy Lists of 1316 and 1326-7.² He would only be assessed on those lists for his temporal benefices; and he appears as paying in 1316 very little less, and in 1326-7 rather more, than Isabella de Clare, who held at this date that portion of the manor which lay in Upton. From this fact we can make certain deductions. At the time of the Dissolution the hospital's property in Burford and Upton was valued at £5 os. 4d. In 1326-7, on an assessment of one-twentieth on land and movable goods, the Master paid 8s. Now even if we allow a considerable proportion of this for the tax on movables, it is obvious that at that time the hospital must already have been in possession of most of the land it held in Burford at the Dissolution.

This consisted of the hospital building with a close and a barn thereon; a tenement called Ivy House with one acre of land; another tenement in the town; three virgates of land in Burford Fields, and twenty-two acres of land in Upton Fields; a close, two gardens, and a little piece of land in Burford, and two closes in Upton. It may very well be that some small portions of this property were given by townspeople; but it has to be noted that the hospital seems to have appealed very little to Burford men as an object for considerable benefactions. Of all the mediaeval wills which we have, each of them containing large gifts to the Church and Gild, only one makes a gift to the hospital, and that is of 13s. 4d. in money, not a gift of property. Consequently it appears to be more probable that the greater part of such lands and tenements as the hospital held in Burford were of its original endowment. That, however, like the identification of the founder, is but conjectural. All that can be said with certainty is that it must have acquired these lands and tenements by the early part of the fourteenth century.

If we take the rental of the Burford and Upton property at that time to have been about £4, and add to it 52s. 6d., the annual value in 1279 of the Fifield lands, and 32s. 1d., the annual value in 1320 of the lands at Asthall and Asthally, allowing 5s. also for the annual value of the virgate at Rissington, the total income of the hospital in the thirteenth century would amount to £9 9s. 7d. This might just suffice for the Master and the two or three brethren, but could hardly have supported a number of poor and sick people. Presumably they depended upon casual alms. The fact that a King's clerk was appointed Master in 1389, with the obvious implication that the office had at least some value, would make it clear that of so small an income none can have been expended upon the charitable work of the hospital.

At some time after the end of the thirteenth century more property was acquired, the most valuable item being the whole manor of Fifield, possibly given by that John de Fifield of whom the hospital held the land there entered in the Hundred Rolls.¹ The other lands were 28 acres of arable and some meadow at Widford, and a tenement with land at Little Barrington.²

In 1435-6 the Master of the hospital was joint tenant with Henry Spyser of the freestone quarry in Burford, at an annual rent of 5s.³ This may possibly indicate that at that date new building was in progress at the hospital. Such remains of ancient building as have been found are of a style which would attribute them to the early fifteenth century; and they may therefore be made to add their testimony to that of the quarry tenancy, and help to justify the belief that at that period a building was being erected which was probably the hospital as it stood at the time of the Dissolution.

³ Part III, p. 609.

existing house, were found to have been incorporated in one of the walls of the mansion which Sir Lawrence Tanfield built on the hospital site. Another arch, in what is now a back passage, indicates that there was also an old wall running north and south along the western end of the building in which the three arches stood. The walls of a ruined wing at the back of the house show clearly ancient work, refaced with new stone, apparently in the seventeenth century.

It would be an impossible task to reconstruct, from such slight material, the hospital building. At any rate, the comparative poverty of the foundation forbids us to suppose that its buildings can have been extensive. The three arches first mentioned, appearing as they do to have belonged to a building lying east and west, may be remains of the chapel; and the wall running north and south might mark the site of the great Hall or refectory, carrying perhaps as an upper structure a solar for the Master's use, a dormitory for the two or three brethren, and an infirmary for the sick. If we imagine the ruined back wing to have contained kitchens, brew-house, store-houses, &c., we shall have provided all that seems to be required for a picture of the Burford Priory of the Middle Ages.

Around it was an area of enclosed land, consisting of meadows, pasture, orchards, and garden plots, the whole occupying very much the same space as the modern gardens and woods. The house called Ivy House was somewhere on this ground—possibly, if we may judge by indications so late as the map of 1797, at the upper corner of the grounds on the opposite side of Priory Lane from the Lamb Inn—and also a large barn, which, again judging by that map, may have stood at the far end of the grounds towards Upton.

It is probable that during the fifteenth century, when the increasing wealth of the townsfolk led to the establishment of more obits and commemorative Masses, the brethren of the hospital began to gain their living rather from emoluments as chantry priests than from the hospital revenues. We have, indeed, no definite evidence of this. The description 'capellanus' appended to the name of a priest, in the Clerical Subsidies, for instance, would be applied equally to a clerical brother of the hospital, to a chantry priest, and to a man who was both one and the other. 'Even the Master of the hospital is, in the one Burford will which includes a bequest to him, described also as 'capellanus'. But though there is no direct evidence, there is, at any rate, a strong possibility. In a place of the moderate size of mediaeval Burford there would hardly be a sufficient number of obits to attract unattached priests from elsewhere; and the insufficient revenues of the hospital would induce the brethren to be on the look-out for the money accruing from such obits as there were. In these circumstances one or two of the Clerical Subsidy lists of the fifteenth century become significant.¹ Those of 1420 and 1435-6 contain respectively three and two names of 'capellani'; that of 1448-9 contains the names of the Master of the hospital and four 'stipendarii in ecclesia'. The first of these Subsidies was levied on all 'capellani' having benefices of seven marks and over; the second on parish priests, stipendiaries and other priests receiving less than ten marks a year; and the third was a Subsidy on all 'capellani', secular friars and other Religious serving parish churches, receiving stipends or annual payments or holding chantries not otherwise taxed. Now the second and third of these must certainly have included the brethren of the hospital and the chantry priests. Obviously, therefore, the numbers being so few, the two must have been the same; there are not enough names to give us two or three brethren and a number of chantry priests as well.

Thus we can understand a little better the curious passing of the patronage of the hospital from the lord of the manor to the Corporation of Burford, which has already been noted in connexion with the Earl of Warwick's letter—undated, but written in some year between 1461 and 1471—to the Bailiffs and Burgesses, asking for leave to present to the mastership one of his chaplains.² If that loosening of the manorial control, which so remarkably increased the general importance of the Corporation, had allowed the nomination to the mastership to slip by default into the Corporation's hands, the assumption of a complete patronage would be much helped forward by dependence of the brethren upon obits founded by the townspeople. The combination of these two tendencies would rapidly make of the hospital something which it certainly had not been originally—namely, an appanage of the town.

This it became with singular completeness in the remaining fifty years of its existence. The last records we have of it as a religious foundation are a remarkable revelation of the extent to which the interference of the Corporation had grown. One of these documents, a petition from the dispossessed Abbot of Rewley to Thomas Cromwell, asking for support in his application to the Bailiffs and Burgesses of Burford for 'a grant of a service called the Priory in that town of £11 a year' as a supplement to his pension, is, of course, much like the Earl of Warwick's letter.¹ But other documents show that, in the sixteenth century, leases of the hospital property were actually made by the Alderman, Steward, and Burgesses in conjunction with the Master, and were sealed with the Town seal as well as the Priory seal.² The dependence of the hospital upon the town could not have been more complete.

The hospital did not come under the operation of the first of the Acts by which the Dissolution of the Monasteries was carried into effect—the Act of 1536. It remained in existence, indeed, so late as September 1538, one of the joint leases by the Master and the Corporation bearing date in that month.³ When the end came it was unheroic. The property was surrendered to the Royal Commissioners by the Master, who received a life pension of £3 6s. 8d. a year—about a quarter of the revenues.⁴

It appears from an Account of later date that the two bells which the hospital possessed became part of the depredations of the notorious Dr: London.⁵ The same Account records that there was no lead on the building; the roofs would have been of stone slates, as would be natural in this district.

The last Master of the hospital, Thomas Cade, had held the mastership in conjunction with the vicarage. It is possible that this had happened before, since Thomas Mayowe, who was certainly Vicar in 1465, was Master of the hospital in 1448-9,¹ and may have continued his tenure after being presented to the vicarage. Cade was an old man at the time of the Dissolution, and had brought the hospital property into some confusion. In 1538 he granted a lease of the property as a whole to one John Barker, at an inclusive annual rent of £10. This farming of the hospital's revenue must have been a practice for some time before this, since there is no assessment of the hospital or the Master for temporal possessions on the Lay Subsidy lists of the town for 1524-5-6. But the lease to Barker was made apparently without regard to leases of separate portions of the property to other persons; and was actually followed in a few months by another lease of a separate portion. The tenants under these leases, which they had taken the precaution to have confirmed by the Court of Augmentations, obtained an injunction against Barker, upon his attempting to secure himself in 1541 by inducing the Court to grant him a new lease on the plea that he had been instrumental in securing the surrender of the hospital.² Barker contested the injunction, but, although the records of the Court of Augmentation do not state the result, it is clear from the tenant-rolls of the next stage in the history of the Priory that he lost his case.³

In 1543 the first step was taken towards converting the hospital into private property, though it was not yet sold outright. It was granted in that year to Edmund Harman, one of the King's barber-surgeons, for his life and his wife's; he paid for the grant £109 19s. 2d., ten years' purchase of the net revenues.⁴ What Harman's first association with Burford had been we do not know; he had no family connexion with it; or even with this part of England, his immediate forbears being of Ipswich.¹ But he evidently had something to do with Burford before he obtained the Priory; for his wife Agnes, mentioned in the grant, was a Sylvester of Burford.²

Admitted to the freedom of the Barbers' Company in 1530, Harman must have been born about 1509. By 1535 he was one of the King's barbers; and he also took rank as one of the Grooms of the Privy Chamber.³ He is mentioned once as Keeper of the Wardrobe;⁴ and he obtained several of those offices of profit, and small grants, which were then the normal way of finding remuneration for the members of the King's Household—stewardships of manors, minor appointments in the Customs, and so on. His career was endangered in 1542, when he was one of the persons of the Privy Chamber who were informed upon as heretically inclined, and in association with Anthony Pearson, the cleric whose preaching at Windsor was made the chief occasion of the scenting out of Lutherans there and about the Court.⁵ But after the burning of Pearson and two others with him, the persecutors lost the King's ear, and some of them had to do penance as perjurers. Harman and other servants of the Household had not fallen victims to the informers, and he obtained the security of a pardon on all heresy charges in 1543.⁶

After this crisis he prospered; for, instead of gathering miscellaneous small sources of profit, he begins to be seen putting together a kind of modest estate. Within a few years of obtaining for a term the dispossessed hospital at Burford he acquired other property here. In 1545 he obtained a grant of the rectory and advowson, with the chapelry of Fulbrook, which he leased forthwith to Thomas Smyth;⁷ and in the same year he bought from the Crown the various mills in Burford and Upton, together with a meadow and a piece of land.⁸ In 1546 he sold his interest in some of the hospital property—the lands at Asthall and Great Rissington —to Edmund Silvester, to whom he also sold one of the mills in Burford.¹ In or about 1547 he also took a lease from the Crown of the agricultural land of the manor of Burford.²

To what extent Harman ever lived in Burford or occupied the Priory is doubtful. He was, until the death of Henry VIII, discharging his office at Court; he is entered in 1545 among members of the Royal Household having their diets at Court, and he was one of the witnesses to the King's will at Westminster in December 1546. He was still with the Court in 1547. Therefore he can only have been in Burford, at the most, occasionally, until 1547. After that, in so far as we have any indications, it is likely that he lived elsewhere. He had added in 1546 to the various grants he had obtained, one of the lordship and manor of Taynton, with the rectory and the advowson of the vicarage there. Now this was more likely to dictate his place of residence than a tenancy for life of the hospital at Burford, which cannot have afforded him any considerable house to live in, and carried with it no manorial position. Moreover, it is clear that he was living at Taynton in 1559, for in that year the entry of the marriage of one of his daughters appears in the Taynton registers. It is hardly likely that, if he had ever settled in Burford, or had (as has been sometimes said) built himself a house there, replacing the hospital building, he would so soon have moved away to a manor which was in his possession within a year or two after he obtained the hospital. It is more natural to conclude that he never took up his residence in Burford, or had much to do with the place, beyond receiving the rents of the properties he held there for his life, and the other properties he had bought. He caused to be placed in Burford Church in 1569 a monument which has the appearance of a sepulchral monument, especially in the tablets which represent, kneeling in tightly packed rows, his nine sons and seven daughters; but the inscription gives no indication that he so intended it, merely recording that it was erected to commemorate the goodness of God to him throughout his life, especially in the children with whom he and his wife had been blessed.

One of these children and a grandchild maintained for some time a connexion with Burford. His daughter Mary married William Johnson or Johnston of Leighton Buzzard ;¹ and he for a few years held the Burford manor lands jointly with Harman. In 1584 Mary and William Johnston and their son Harman Johnston obtained a grant of the Rectory of Burford and Chapel of Fulbrook (the original grant to Harman being about to expire) for three lives successively ;² and in 1596, as appears by two assessments in one of the fragments of the Record Book of the Borough Court, ' Mr. Harman Jhonson ' was living in Burford,³ possibly occupying the Rectory house.

But meanwhile, Harman's death being followed within a few days by the death of his wife, the hospital, which was only granted for the term of their two lives, had, like the manor lands, reverted to the Crown. When next there is record of it, it is already in the hands of Sir Lawrence Tanfield, who had acquired it before he became lord of the manor and town of Burford. For in the deed of the sale of these lordships by the heirs of Sir John Fortescue to Tanfield, he is described as ' of the Pryorye nere Burford '.

Tanfield's association with Burford must have begun when he was quite a small child, if indeed he was not born here. His father, Robert Tanfield, was a younger son of a Northamptonshire family, which had acquired by purchase late in the fifteenth century the manor of Gayton, in that county ;⁴ and he retained to the end of his life some connexion with Northamptonshire, for he is found presenting to the living of Harrowden Magna in January 1557. In that year or early in the following year he died, for the next presentation, in March 1558, is in the name of his widow, Wilgeford Tanfield.⁵

his more famous son, as 'of Burford'. This appears to rest upon a single reference to him in the Herald's Visitation of Northamptonshire in 1564, wherein, under the family of Fermor of Easton Neston, it is recorded that a son of that family, Richard, married 'Dyonisia daughter of Robert Tanfield of Burford, Co. Oxon.'¹ No Tanfield pedigree appears in that Visitation. In the pedigree recorded by the Visitation of 1618-19 Robert's name is entered without any reference to Burford, though his son is duly described as of Burford.² Nor does the father's name appear anywhere in the Burford Records, nor on any of the extant Burford Subsidy lists of the time, nor among the tenants in the Edwardian Survey of the manor and town.

Still against the clear statement in the Visitation of 1564 negative considerations cannot easily prevail, and we must conclude that Robert Tanfield did live in Burford.³ We may the more readily do so, since we know that he was not by any means a rich man, and must have lived here in unassuming conditions. There is just a glimpse of him in the curious Life of Lady Falkland, daughter of Sir Lawrence Tanfield, which opens, somewhat abruptly, thus :

She was born in the year of our Lord 1585 or 1586 in Oxfordshire, at the priory of Burford, her father's house. He was a lawyer, afterwards a judge and Lord Chief Baron; his name was Laurence Tanfield. His father was a younger brother, who, dying, left him a child, giving him all he had, which was not much; but what it was, his mother parted among his sisters and herself, breeding him well; and as soon as his age would permit, sent him to Lincoln's Inn to study law, where, as soon as he was capable of practice, she left him to shift for himself. . . . He was called to the bar at eighteen years old.

These statements, which may certainly be taken as authoritative,¹ give us a view of Robert Tanfield's circumstances which may well account for his not appearing on any of our Records.

Lawrence Tanfield must have been a very small child when his father died, for he was not entered at the Inner Temple² till 1569. As he was called to the Bar at eighteen years old, he cannot have been much more than fifteen when he was entered, and must therefore have been about three years old at his father's death. The latter must presumably have lived some time at Burford, to be described in 1564 as 'of' that place; and hence it becomes quite likely that Lawrence was born there. This may perhaps have added to the bitterness of the feeling against him later on, when the townsfolk laid at his door the loss of their alleged privileges.³ Where he had the education which his mother secured for him we do not know; the Burford Grammar School was not then in existence. But he must have been diligent; and could very well be left 'to shift for himself'. His first case, the Life of Lady Falkland tells us, was against the Crown. A relation had given him his brief, not so much, we are frankly told, from belief in his powers as from the feeling that it would not matter much if an obscure lawyer lost the case. However, Tanfield won, and the Crown's counsel prophesied a great career for him.⁴

In 1584 he had advanced so far as to be sitting in Parliament for the Borough of New Woodstock; and about this time he was already in possession of the Priory, since, as we have seen, his daughter was born there in 1585 or 1586. That he had also other property in the town is shown by a document concerning some Grammar School property in 1599, containing reference to 'a barn of Laurence Tanfield Esq.' on the north side of Witney Street.¹

The words 'her father's house', in the opening sentence of the Life of Lady Falkland, may imply that he had erected his fine mansion on the hospital site before 1585. Certainly there must have been a big house here when in 1603 King James I paid a visit to Tanfield, arriving on September 9 and staying till September 11.² Nothing could show better than this royal visit how successfully Tanfield had established himself and the Priory in the world. He was still plain Mr. Tanfield, Sergeant-at-Law since Easter of that year. Yet he had contrived to have Burford Priory included in the arrangements for King James's first great progress in his new kingdom, although there were many more notable family seats at which the King and Court might have stayed in this neighbourhood. Tanfield had good reason to commemorate the occasion by the erection of the large royal coat of arms still extant on the Priory wall.

Thus we come at last to that point in the history of the Priory which is common to the history of nearly all the religious foundations of England, the point at which they were converted, in varying degrees of size and importance, into the mansions of private estates. For some years, indeed, Burford Priory in its new conditions was much more of mansion than of estate. The old hospital brought to its lay owners none of those considerable territories which went with the majority of the monastic houses. Some parts even of the small property it had once possessed must have been disposed of before the Dissolution. The Asthall property, which at the time of Joan de Cornwall's grant in 1320 had consisted of five messuages and various lands, valued altogether at 52s. 1d. a year, was only represented at the time of the Dissolution by a single messuage and some land, valued altogether at 33s. 4d., a greater decline than appears, since the value of money had decreased. Again, Harman had alienated what remained of the Asthall lands, and also the Rissington lands. Finally, the Fifield manor must also have become separated from the hospital property before Tanfield acquired it, since that manor never appears as part of his possessions. Thus the Priory estate, as such, can have been nothing more than the eight acres of grounds, a house or two upon these and in Burford, and a little arable in Burford and Upton Fields.

The Priory mansion, on the other hand, must have been a quite spacious and imposing edifice.¹ If we compare the deed of Lenthall's purchase from Tanfield's heir with that of Tanfield's own original purchase, we observe that the price recorded in the former is £7,000, and in the latter £1,900. Yet the only item in the former which is not in the latter is 'the capital messuage or mansion called the Priory House'. That must therefore account for the £5,000 of difference, a sum which, multiplied, as it has to be, by five or six to give its equivalent in modern money, can hardly represent anything less than the great house of the old prints.

But in due time Tanfield was able to correct this disproportion between his mansion and his estate at Burford. The death of Sir John Fortescue, who had bought the lordship of the manor and town from the Crown, gave him his chance. In 1617 he bought the lordship from Fortescue's heirs; and by a later purchase extinguished separate leases of the Bury Barns house and farm land. With the lordship went several houses in the town which had passed into the hands of the Crown by confiscation, and had not been re-sold.

Thus was built up, in more senses than one, the Burford Priory which was to take its place among the family seats of

Oxfordshire. Tanfield had put together, with a skill that approaches art, the requisite elements of a good country estate. In the hospital property he had the associations of an ancient tradition; and the Master had in the old days been described often enough as Prior to cause the hospital to be referred to occasionally as 'the Priory', so that even in the matter of the name of the estate Tanfield had secured an admirable measure of dignity. The purchase from Fortescue's heirs introduced both a position of authority and a respectable rent-roll. He also obtained for himself the additional position of patron of the living, by taking a lease of the Rectory; though this last he did not add to the estate by outright purchase.

How this opening of a new chapter in the history of the Priory involved also the opening of a new chapter, in a rather unfortunate sense, for the people of Burford has been told in 'the History of the Corporation.' The result was that from the first the relations between Burford and the fine new estate were unpleasant. Such impressions of life in the Priory itself as it is possible to obtain are not pleasant either. Lady Tanfield was a daughter of Giles Symonds of Claye, Norfolk, and a niece of the famous Sir Harry Lee, of Ditchley, where a portrait of her, recognizably like her effigy on the Tanfield monument in Burford Church, is preserved. She was a woman as overbearing as her husband; and a note in the Churchwardens' Accounts, stating that her appropriation of space in the Church for the monument was without the leave of the Churchwardens, shows that she shared her husband's unpopularity in the town. Her daughter had no very happy childhood, being even reduced to bribing the servants in order to obtain candles for reading at night—a real hardship, for she was a studious child, and grew up a learned woman; and in later years, when Lady Falkland had forfeited her position and lost friends by joining the Roman Church, and was in real poverty, Lady Tanfield refused to receive her at the Priory, or to give her any assistance.

Tanfield himself did not live long after he had to the full asserted himself and his rights in the place. He died in April 1625. His wife survived him in possession of the Priory for three years. On her death in 1628 it passed, not to the next generation, the daughter who had married the first Lord Falkland, but to the Tanfields' grandson, Lucius Cary, the second and more famous Falkland. This was by the direction of Tanfield's will. His daughter's marriage had not pleased him. She had allowed her dowry to be swallowed up in a constant vain effort to keep abreast of her husband's extravagant expenditure; and Tanfield was evidently determined that the remainder of his property should not go the same way.¹

Lucius Cary was born at the Priory in 1610. His mother had been married to Lord Falkland in 1600, and their first two children had been daughters. Tanfield appears to have decided at once that the son now born should be his heir, for he kept the boy to live with him at the Priory.² At eighteen years old he succeeded to the Priory, and at the same time to the estates at Great Tew. Three years later, in 1631, he married Lettice Morison; and he seems, after his marriage, to have made Great Tew his principal residence. But he must still have continued to reside at the Priory occasionally, for his second son, Henry, was born here on November 6, 1634, and baptized on November 21. It is, therefore, possible that Burford Priory has some share in those gatherings of notable men which have given Falkland a place peculiarly his own among the intellects of his time. Great Tew is, in the main, the scene of the philosophic symposia to which Ben Jonson and Suckling, Cowley, Waller, Edward Hyde and Chillingworth brought their wit, their taste, and their learning. But the Priory may have had glimpses of them too.

Still, it is clear that it had not the first place in Falkland's affections; for when his circumstances compelled him to dispose of one of the estates, it was Burford Priory that he gave up. He sold it in 1637 to William Lenthall, afterwards Speaker of the House of Commons.¹

Coming of a family early settled in Herefordshire, one of whom by marriage acquired the manor of Lachford, and so founded at Haseley a branch of Oxfordshire Lenthalls, William Lenthall was born at Henley in 1591. The entry of the baptism records him as William Lenthall, son of John Lenthall; his father's name was William, and the name John was entered in error.² After being educated at Thame Grammar School and St. Alban Hall, Oxford, he took to the law, having an elder brother to succeed to the estates. He must have met with no little success, for when he purchased Burford Priory he was already owner by purchase of another estate, the manor of Besselsleigh. His connexion with Burford, however, began before he became owner of the Priory.³ He must have been living here in 1626, for William, his second son, was baptized in Burford Church on January 8, 1626/7. In 1628, when the Royal Commission appointed a new body of Feoffees to hold the Charity Properties, one of the body was 'William Lenthall Esquire, of Burford'. In 1631 he acted as counsel for the town in the proceedings in the Court of Exchequer with regard to lands alleged to have been concealed from the Crown under the Act dissolving the Chantries.

In 1640, being by that time settled at the Priory, Lenthall was elected Member for Woodstock, the seat which Tanfield had once held, in that Parliament which was to change so violently the course of English history; and at the very outset of its career Lenthall was thrown into prominence by being elected Speaker of the House of Commons in flat opposition to the known wish of the King for the appointment of Gardiner, Recorder of London. Speaker Lenthall has an uneasy place in history. His own death-bed protestation that he not only did not consent to the execution of Charles I, but actually did not know that the idea of it was seriously intended, his continuance in high place and offices of profit under the Commonwealth, his official welcoming of General Monk as the forerunner of the Restoration, and his immediate contribution of £3,000 to the Exchequer of the restored King—all these facts lend themselves but too easily to the view that he was at the best of indecisive character, at the worst, in Anthony Wood's slap-dash description, 'a knave'. The truth seems to be that he is a very good example of that curious and not uninteresting type, the instinctive House of Commons man. Such men are to be found at many periods since Lenthall's day, and not least in our own time. With a natural understanding and quick, almost unconscious, grasp of the subtleties of the relation between a nominal monarchy and an actually democratic governing principle, the House of Commons man is always constitutionally right; but very often politically ineffective, tactically unerring but strategically inconsistent. He is more aware of that subtle relation between forces, and the power which maintains the relation, than of the forces themselves.

² See some letters written by Mr. F. Kyffin Lenthall in 1868 to the Rev. W. H. Turner, of Oxford, who edited the Oxfordshire Visitations for the Harleian Society. Mr. Lenthall provides good reason for holding that Speaker Lenthall was born at Henley. Bodl. MSS. Add. A. 289.

In this light we can better understand Lenthall's career. It was real capacity, and not a more or less accidental choice, which had raised him to the Speakership, but capacity of precisely this narrow Parliamentary kind. We hear the very voice of it in his famous saying, which has become a maxim of the Speaker's Chair—his answer to Charles I when the King demanded to know if the five Members he meant to arrest were in the House: 'I have, Sir, neither eyes to see, nor tongue to speak, in this place but as the House is pleased to direct me, whose servant I am.' It is an almost incredibly perfect Parliamentary reply. At the same time it illuminates Lenthall's character, for on the one hand it is evidence of his singular fitness for the office he filled, and on the other hand it could only have been uttered by a man so penetrated with the spirit of the House of Commons as to be in process of surrendering any spirit of his own. It is significant that Lenthall withstood in precisely the same official way the determination of Cromwell to dissolve the Long Parliament ; he would not leave the Chair without technical force being used. He was not a mere time-server. He had sunk his own individuality too much for even that kind of self-expression to remain.

His acquisition of one office of profit after another—he was Master of the Rolls, a Commissioner of the Great Seal, and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, as well as Speaker—is not to be judged by modern standards. Public opinion as to all kinds of pluralities was looser than it is to-day. Nor was he alone in virtually purchasing his pardon after the Restoration. It is not difficult, once we have discovered the mainspring of his character, to see him as guided at first by the belief, natural to so good a House of Commons man, that Parliament would be able to control the forces it had aroused, yet acquiescing honestly enough in the Restoration when he had found he had been mistaken.

After the Restoration he retired permanently to Burford Priory. He must have lived here much throughout the Commonwealth time, for he was on the Commission of the Peace for the town appointed by the Commonwealth ; and he had brought to the Priory, not to his other estate of Besselsleigh, those famous pictures which he had purchased from Charles I's collection at Windsor, including the Holbein group of Sir Thomas More's family, the Van Dyck of Queen Henrietta Maria, and two Correggios.

Yet it would be a mistake to think of Lenthall as consciously retiring to Burford under a cloud. In 1660 he presented himself as candidate for election to Parliament as one of the burgesses for Oxford. General Monk supported his candidature, and dispatched to Oxford 'one of his captaines of horse, a gentleman of an estate (named Edmund Warcuppe) nephew to the said W. Lenthall'.¹ This man we can identify as a Burford resident ; he lived in the house adjoining to the almshouse on the south side by Gildenford. John Lenthall, William's son, also busied himself on his father's behalf, giving dinners of beef and ale to the voters.¹ This candidature, unsuccessful though it was, could hardly have been undertaken at all, in Oxford of all places, if we are to imagine Lenthall as the discredited, double-faced person some of his critics have presented to us. It is, on the contrary, good support for the view that his apparent inconsistencies arose from a consistent faith in the House of Commons. That House failed in the great task it attempted after 1649; but this was no reason why Lenthall should cease to believe in it, or believe in his own fitness for membership of it, when it returned to its ancient position in the State.

He was not, however, to sit again in that Chamber which had seen so much of his life; and he settled down at the Priory. He had, since he first bought the place, made several alterations and enlarged the house. Unfortunately little that is good can be said for his work. Of its taste we have an instance in the clumsy ill-proportioned chimney-piece in the great drawing-room, as poor in execution as it is in design. Of its character as building we have an equally revealing instance in the flatness and poverty of the south wall of the south wing, and in the weak construction of the chapel, where a heavy vaulted ceiling was placed upon walls which had no foundations. This chapel was the work of his last years, perhaps after he had finally retired to the Priory. It is dated by a letter from the Bishop of Oxford to the Bishop of London, written on June 26, 1662,² asking for a copy of the 'uniform book of articles', and adding: 'If with the book of articles an uniform order of consecrating Churches and Chapels come along with it, it would add to the general satisfaction and please me much, who am called upon to consecrate a Chapel at Burford, a most elegant piece.' Much as the Chapel suffered in the long neglect of the Priory during the nineteenth century, enough remains to show that the most that can be said for it is that it was a good specimen of just what the taste of that age would call 'an elegant piece'. It displays both the weakness and the floridness of design which vitiated Renaissance Gothic building of any but the first rank. The window tracery is uninteresting; and the fragments of the carved decoration of the interior show that it was feeble work, when it was not, as in the two statues flanking the doorway, grotesquely awkward.¹ Seen from a little distance in a merely picturesque relation to the main building, the Chapel, especially with the arcaded gallery leading to it, is certainly an effective addition to the general view of the Priory. But as a place of devotion the Chapel has no dignity or beauty; and there is nothing in what survives of it to arouse regret for what decay has removed.

Speaker Lenthall can have had but brief pleasure in his chapel. He died on September 1, 1662, leaving a bequest of money to the town charities, and was succeeded in the Priory estate by his eldest son, John Lenthall, whom Anthony Wood describes in his bitterest style as 'the great Braggadochio and Lyar of the age he lived in', and, more abruptly, as 'a beast'. He would certainly have exposed himself even more than his father to Wood's Royalist prejudices; for he was a more out-and-out Parliamentarian. Elected Member for Gloucester in 1645, he received a Commonwealth 'baronetcy' in 1658, and for a few months in 1660, before the Restoration, he was Governor of Windsor. The best of his reputation is due to Colonel Hutchinson, who in his account of the debate in the House of Commons in 1660, concerning the execution of Charles I, records that John Lenthall, refusing the quibbles of which some members availed themselves, spoke boldly and firmly of the policy and the course of events which had led to the condemnation of the King.²

In face of that evidence, Anthony Wood's characterization of the man can hardly satisfy us. John Lenthall evidently had courage, and—perhaps because he had entered on the troublous times as a younger man—a more vigorous conviction of the rightness of the Parliamentary cause than his father held. Yet the fact remains that he weakened in it, and so far stultified himself as to receive knighthood from Charles II in 1677. He served as High Sheriff of Oxfordshire in 1672. Perhaps we may take it that Wood's view of him is an exaggerated representation of a phase of his life in which, having surrendered for the sake of safety and comfort the principles he had once maintained, he had lost respect.

The Burford Records show us very little of him, beyond his merely formal position in the town. Indeed, he may have been but little here; and at one time during his tenure of the estate there was a possibility that Burford might have had a far more distinguished squire, the great Duke of Ormonde, who took a short tenancy of the Priory in 1672, and was living here from November in that year to February 1673. The Duchess of Ormonde writes under date November 16, 1672, to Captain Mathew, a business agent of the Duke's: 'We shall go within a few days to a place called Burford in Oxfordshire, where I may try whether we can live cheaper than at London';¹ and again, under date December 21, 1672, from Burford: 'I am settled here for a while until my lord's going up into the Parliament, which will be the beginning of February next, at which time I purpose to go too; whereby to avoid the excuse of keeping two houses. I was, I confess, desirous to try whether living in the country for a considerable part of the year would abate the charge we are at in London, and I find it will very considerably.'² That it was at the Priory at which the Duke and Duchess were staying is clear from a letter of some years later in which Colonel Edward Cooke, writing to the Duke about Charles II's visit in March 1680/1 to the Burford races, speaks of Lenthall as 'your Grace's quondam landlord'.³ Evidently, from the phrases the Duchess uses, the tenancy might have become more or less permanent; but presumably the Ormondes did not much care for the place, or at any rate on trying Cornbury preferred that house, for in later years this economical villegiatura took place there.¹

It appears that John Lenthall was not living at the Priory when the visit of Charles II took place. Colonel Cooke says that the King, as he came into Burford, 'was met by the reverend magistrates, welcomed with a hearty speech and a rich saddle, and so eat his dinner at your Grace's old quarters'. Anthony Wood says that the Burford Corporation 'accompanied him to Sir John Lenthall's house'.² But there is no mention of Lenthall himself; and if he had been here at the time he would hardly have been absent or have left to others the conducting of the King to the Priory. He may already have been lying at Besselsleigh in his last illness, for he died at that place in November of this same year, 1681.³

His only son, William Lenthall, succeeding to the estates, made no attempt to carry on the baronetcy and title which John Lenthall had received under the Commonwealth. His tenure was a brief one, for he died in September 1686. But he seems to have lived at the Priory. He also comes under Anthony Wood's lash; in recording young Lenthall's death, Wood ends his note: 'The grandfather, a knave; the son, a beast; the grandson, a fool.' Wood adds some scandal about young William Lenthall's wife. She had been Catherine Hamilton, and Wood records with uncompromising frankness the reputation she bore before her marriage in the dissolute Court of that time, insinuating that it was not improved by her behaviour at Burford.¹ After Lenthall's death she married her cousin, the Earl of Abercorn; and a document bearing her signature after this marriage is among the Burford Records.²

The honours of the next royal visit to Burford fell to Lord and Lady Abercorn. On November 3, 1695, William III came to the town, receiving the customary Burford gift of a fine saddle, and spent the night at the Priory.³

The townspeople's attitude towards the Priory was not improving. In 1686 they took upon themselves to call Lady Abercorn, as lady of the manor, to account for remissness in the holding of the annual court at which the Bailiffs were appointed. The Burgesses seem to have had some intention of applying for a Mandamus. Lady Abercorn on her side retaliated by questioning the right of the Burgesses to present four persons at the Manorial Court for the selection of two of them to be Bailiffs; her case was that this custom had only arisen in days when the Steward of the Manor was not sufficiently acquainted with the town to make his own choice, and that she was not bound to pay any attention to the Burgesses' presentations. The matter collapsed without attaining to any importance; but it is significant as a sign of the continued ill-feeling.⁴

We need hardly be surprised, therefore, that there was plenty of malicious gossip when, on April 3, 1697, John Pryor, one of the trustees under William Lenthall's will for his two young sons, was found murdered in the Priory grounds. Tradition says that the body was discovered in a summer house in the upper part of the garden. As Lord Abercorn was accused of the murder, and as newspapers were beginning by that time to be spread abroad, there was plenty of excitement about the case. Both the newspapers and the diarists of the time were ready enough with accounts of how the murder had been committed, and with explanations of the reason for it. The theory most favoured was that Pryor, dutifully protecting the interests of the Lenthall boys, had refused to lend himself to schemes of Lord Abercorn's. The Earl was tried at the Oxford Assizes, the Duke of Norfolk and the Earl of Arran coming down to use their influence on his behalf ; and he was acquitted.¹ No one was ever convicted of the murder.

The younger of William Lenthall's sons, who were both lads at this time, appears to have taken to the Bar as a profession, and to literature as an amusement. We have a glimpse of him in Hearne's Diary. Hearne notes under date December 3rd, 1705, that William Lenthall of Lincoln's Inn, gentleman, had had to insert an apology in the London Gazette for a libel on Mr. Manley and Mr. Walker in a poem which Lenthall had 'writ and published', called 'A Trip to Liverpool'.²

The elder son, John, who succeeded to the estates, was to hold them for a very long time ; he did not die till 1763. He figures considerably in Burford history, for he was the Lenthall whose concern for the disposition of the Speaker's bequest to the town charities, about which his two predecessors had not troubled themselves, led to the Royal Commission of 1738 and the Chancery suit of 1742, when the Corporation contested the Commission's authority. The fact that he was determined to inquire into the existing conditions of the bequest, and pursued his resolve so firmly, is enough to show that he was of a different calibre from his father and grandfather. A copy of the Commission's report, plentifully annotated by Lenthall himself, is preserved at the Tolsey ; and the comments on it reveal the man. They are eloquent of clear-headedness in singling out and sticking to an essential point, not unworthy of a professional lawyer.

² Hearne's Collections, vol. i, p. 115.

The obvious contempt for the pettiness of the town's affairs is that of a man of the world ; and he is extremely impatient of anything he deems dishonourable. One has to remember that when he wrote these notes, the Corporation, discredited as they were by the report, had made up their minds to fight on a technical legal point, which could not clear their honour, but might save their self-importance ; the annotations are plainly intended for use in connexion with the Chancery suit. Therefore a certain amount of irritation may be excused in them. But even making that allowance, we cannot but see that Lenthall was rather intolerant and overbearing ; not at all the kind of man to be popular in the town.

So his long and steady tenure of the estate, while it no doubt restored the respectability of the Priory, somewhat tarnished by the Speaker's immediate successors, did not help on to any better footing the relations between the Priory and the townsfolk. The Speaker, we may well imagine, had not been the kind of man to conciliate the resentment aroused by Tanfield's assertion of his rights and extinction of the town's privileges. Moreover, even if he had taken the trouble to be conciliatory, the town, in its flush of excitement with the races and the fine comings and goings of the Restoration, probably felt a new kind of resentment when it reflected that the Priory stood for the dull and now defeated Parliamentarians. Burford's opinion of John and William Lenthall would be, we may be sure, the summary one that Anthony Wood expresses. Following upon all this, the attack of the later John Lenthall upon the one public responsibility which remained to give the Corporation any importance banished finally any chance of more genial relations between the Priory and the town. To the end one cannot find that any Lenthall was affectionately, or even loyally, regarded by Burford people.

Of the mansion and grounds during John Lenthall's life we have one glimpse, and the account of them accords precisely with the character we have seen revealed in other ways. One John Borlase, a Gloucester engraver, who kept up a voluminous correspondence with one of his patrons, Lyttelton, at that time Dean of Exeter, and wrote to him especially about possible subjects for engravings, made a journey to Oxford in 1753 by way of Burford. After a brief description of the Church Borlase says :

The Priory, now the house of Mr. Lenthall, seems to be a mighty good old house in perfect repair—the Chapel adjoining has much Gothick ornament and some rich carvings over the Door. The whole would make a good Print, if Justice be done to it—but 'tis so neat that I can hardly think it prior to y^e Reformation; and the Plantations round it are too close and crowded for such a low situation.¹

This last sentence shows that by the middle of the eighteenth century the general aspect of the Priory must have been almost exactly what it is now. The old fields and pastures of the hospital had given place, in the century and a half since Tanfield had made a country seat of it, to wooded grounds covering the eight acres of the enclosure. The only real difference from the conditions of the present day was made by the course of the Cirencester road, which instead of passing out from the town in a more or less straight line from Sheep Street, turned down to the right towards the river, cutting through the woods at an angle. The remark that the Priory house was 'in perfect repair' is exactly what we should expect from what we have seen elsewhere of John Lenthall. Precise, upright and rather exacting, he would be just the man to hand over the estate in good order to his successor. There are one or two documents among the Miscellanea of the Burford Records which suggest that he had the idea of improving the property by exchanging detached and outlying portions for lands in other ownerships adjoining to Priory lands, thus beginning that consolidation of the estate which his successors were to have a better opportunity of carrying out.

The first real step in this direction is the chief contribution of the next owner of the estate to the history of the Priory. John Lenthall died in 1763, and his son William succeeded him. The fact that within ten years he carried through the enclosure of the common arable land at Upton shows that he was no unworthy successor to his father in management of the estate. For although he had practically no interests but his own to consider—the Lenthall allotment at Upton being 720 acres out of 803 acres enclosed—yet his having decided, at so early a date, to conform to the still new and contested theories of agricultural betterment is proof of an intelligent view of his opportunities as a landlord. There were many landowners of that time who were not to be convinced that enclosure was an improvement, and maintained their estates on the old strip system. William Lenthall perceived the advantage of compact distinct farms.

The other mark he has left upon the history of the Priory was to prove less fortunate in its results. He was unmarried, and, perhaps for that reason, he was the first of the Lenthalls to make an entailed settlement of the Priory, instead of passing it on, as his predecessors had done, by simple testamentary disposition to the next heir. He settled it to pass to his brother and his brother's heirs. The estate, which had never been more than a pleasantly comfortable property, not a really wealthy property, was within a very short time to prove unequal to the strain of a settlement which made mortgage the only means of meeting any large unusual expenses. Nor were the difficulties, when they came, lightened by the fact that William Lenthall had charged the estate with a considerable annual allowance to his sister Mary,¹ not merely for her life, but subject to her own disposal at her death.

He died on October 22, 1781. The brother, John Lenthall, died soon after, in 1783. His son, another John, was no unworthy successor to the estates, in the matter of energetic concern for improvements. But he certainly allowed his energy to outrun his discretion. In so far as we can trace the cause of the embarrassments under which the property began to labour while he held it, the first of them was due to the very natural sequel to his brother's enclosure of the Upton arable, namely the enclosure of the Burford and Signett arable, which took place in 1795. Although other interests had to be consulted to a rather larger extent on this occasion, still there were only two persons seriously concerned in the matter, John Lenthall and the lay impropriator of the rectorial tithe. Between them these two received about 820 out of the 1,100 acres enclosed. This, while no doubt in one respect convenient, had the concurrent drawback of placing practically all the expense, whether of the making of the Award or the subsequent construction of walls, hedges, and the private roads, on only two men's shoulders. Now it is pretty clear that this came on top of a large amount of the expense of the Upton enclosure still outstanding. The road from Upton to Little Barrington which was being made as late as 1814, when the stone coffin was found, was one of the roads ordered to be made by the Award of 1773. The addition to these overdue burdens of fresh burdens in connexion with the Burford Award led to the beginning of a series of mortgages, placed upon the estate within the next twenty-five years.

At the same time it must be recognized that, as a mere estate improvement, the step was a good one. For, apart from the convenience and better cultivation of enclosed fields, Lenthall was able, by arrangements made at the time of the Award, and even in some measure guiding the decisions of the Award, to secure exchanges of the land allotted by the Commissioners, in such a manner as to gather the whole landed property of the Priory neatly around Bury Barns and the Priory itself, making the estate in the latter respect practically unbroken from the western side of Burford through Upton to the Barrington boundary. This satisfactory consolidation of the property might well seem worth the rather heavy expenses involved.

Equally an improvement, in a different way, was the diversion of the westward road out of Burford, whereby John Lenthall secured the privacy of the Priory woods and grounds. The improvement to the road itself was quite as great. The dip down to the river and up again, with the awkward slants in direction, was abolished, and a straight course provided more or less in a line with Sheep Street. But it may be doubted whether this, which was after all only an improvement in the amenities of the place, not in the practical working of the estate, could also be considered worth the expenses involved. It was this costly scheme which, according to tradition, really brought the family into financial straits. The strain had, however, undoubtedly begun earlier, with the serious expenses of all the enclosing that had to be done in pursuance of the Awards of 1773 and 1795.

To the effects of this strain, and the narrowed prospects that were being forced upon him by various mortgages, we may safely attribute another manifestation of John Lenthall's energy, a lamentable one for the Priory. He reduced to its present dimensions the large mansion built by Tanfield and Speaker Lenthall. A detailed account of what he did is given later in this chapter. Possibly his reconstruction may have been partly suggested by the building having begun to fall out of repair. The alterations were begun in 1808;¹ and in the fifty years that had elapsed since John Borlase saw it in 1753, a time during which the estate had been held by men whose interest in the property had been so much taken up in other directions, the house may have fallen into a less happy condition. John Lenthall, confronted with the necessity of spending money on the structure, may well have decided, in view of the already crippled condition of the estate, to spend it in reducing the mansion to a size better adapted to the family's existing means, rather than in repairing a house which would always be a burden. That was, at any rate, the practical result of his work.

The last years of John Lenthall's life must have been very largely occupied with raising and readjusting the numerous mortgages which his activities had imposed on the property.² In addition to the cost of his improvements he had to find money to convert Mary Lenthall's charge upon the estate into an equivalent value in Consols; and also at intervals to maintain his son, William John, in the Guards; though it must in fairness be said that the young man made no excessive demands. The mortgages were consolidated ultimately into a single loan, and to meet the situation this loan had to be of no less a sum than £19,000.

Upon John Lenthall's death in November 1820 his son succeeded to a property encumbered even beyond that sum. He made little attempt to deal with conditions that must have been hopeless. One or two parts of the estate he soon sold. A considerable part of the Upton property was bought by the Kempster family; and the Bury Barns property was bought by the Faulkners, who had for some time been farming it as tenants. Part of the house property in the town was sold by public auction. Finally the Lenthall connexion with the Priory was severed outright in 1828, when the mansion and the remainder of the estate, with the lordship of the manor and town of Burford, were sold to Charles Greenaway, of Barrington Grove. He came of a family which had made a fortune in business in the city of Gloucester, and his father, Giles Greenaway, had bought Barrington Grove with the lordship of that manor a little before the end of the eighteenth century.

Under its new owner the Priory entered upon the dismal period of neglect and decay which finally reduced it to a ruin all but beyond hope of repair. The commonly accepted story was that, knowing his property would descend to a niece whom he disliked, Miss Youde, Mr. Greenaway deliberately allowed it to deteriorate. Another account was that the extravagance of this niece's father prevented any proper care being taken of the Priory.¹ Mr. Greenaway died on November 25, 1859; and the Priory estate was for some years in Chancery.

By the time it came into the hands of Mr. Hurst of Horsham Park, Sussex, a nephew of Mr. Greenaway's wife, in the year 1892 on the death of Miss Youde, the house was already ruinous. In that condition it long remained. During the latter part of the nineteenth century, with the increasing taste for touring about the country and observing picturesque places, Burford Priory became one of the favourite objects for expeditions from Oxford. The house and grounds were open to all comers, and were a favourite resort of Burford people. By a curious freak of destiny the place thus revived in its days of decay the fame which it had lost ; and just because it was open to any chance visitor it became far better known to the world at large than many finer houses of the county, such as Chastleton House or Shipton Court.

In course of time the Priory reached such an advanced state of ruin that nothing but sheer dissolution appeared to await it. However, Colonel La Terrière, buying it in 1908, set to work upon it, and in a very short space of time had made it again a human habitation. He introduced some structural alterations. The front door of the house as it stood led into a comparatively narrow hall, from which a dining-room opened on the right and a reception-room on the left. He took down the right-hand wall, thus throwing the dining-room into the hall and making the latter very spacious and pleasant. The left-hand wall of the hall was the one in which the three mediaeval arches were found ; these he removed, as they could not be displayed in that position, and re-erected them across his new hall, more or less on the line of the dining-room wall which he had taken down. By diminishing the size of the reception-room, and so enlarging an old parlour behind it, he was able to make a dining-room of the latter. The old kitchen was a very high room, some seventeen feet from floor to ceiling. By lowering this ceiling and other slight alterations, an extra bedroom was contrived, looking towards the river. The chapel, the roof of which had already been repaired to some extent by Mr. Hurst, Colonel La Terrière made sound and weatherproof, but did not attempt to restore internally.

In 1912 the Priory was bought by its present owner, Mr. Emslie John Horniman.

The difference between the Priory of to-day and the building engraved in Skelton's Antiquities of Oxfordshire calls for some explanation.

PLATE XVI. BURFORD PRIORY

The first mansion built upon the site of the mediaeval hospital was evidently a large E-shaped house, facing eastwards. To north and south were wings rising to a single gable, each of the same frontage-width as the present wings, but rather higher and much farther apart; between the wings was a long central bay, and in the middle of it, set back from the line of the wings, was the existing porch, also higher than it is now. The windows of this façade would have been plain square-headed mullioned windows, in the same style as the two still surviving in the peak of the gables, though of course those on the lower levels would have been more ample in size. The two ornate bays now on this frontage were originally on the south frontage, facing the garden—a more natural position for windows of this open and elaborate kind.

That would appear to have been Tanfield's house, a simpler and more harmonious structure than that shown in Skelton's engraving. The house he drew was the result of later alterations. Who carried them out we cannot know for certain, but we may safely assume from the apparent date of the work, as well as from what we know of his successors, that it was Speaker Lenthall. First he removed the two bay windows from their original position, and re-erected them on the eastern faces of the two wings. The traces of this change are quite obvious, not only in the rather blank and patched-up appearance of the wall from which they were taken,¹ but in the facts that they are not bonded into the walls against which they stand, and that these walls have a distinct batter, while the bays are plumb upright. The most probable reason which has been advanced for this moving of the bays is that Speaker Lenthall wanted more wall-space in the south room for hanging the pictures he had acquired from Charles I's collection. This was certainly the room in which they hung, for the walls showed, within living memory, the marks of the places once covered by the pictures. Next he doubled the frontage-width of the north and south wings, and did not do it symmetrically. The south wing was extended on the side nearest the porch, and the north wing on the side nearest the river, with the result that the porch was no longer in the centre of the façade. Moreover, the bay windows, instead of being both on the outer half of the wings or both on the inner half, as symmetry would have ordained, stood on the outer half of the south wing and the inner half of the north wing. The proof of this later doubling of the width of the wings is that in the southern wing an outside chimney stack was discovered in what was then the middle wall of the wing, showing that the wings Tanfield built had later on been added to.

Thus we have at last, with the addition of Speaker Lenthall's chapel and arcaded gallery, the house which Skelton drew. It was also the house John Lenthall reduced in size about the year 1808 or 1809. Speaker Lenthall's building was all bad work. The one considerable piece of it which is left, the chapel, has actually no foundations. It is therefore likely that his additions to the north and south wings were in bad condition, for they were not incorporated in the reconstruction.¹ John Lenthall destroyed them, and also cut out completely the long bay of building between the wings. He was thus left with the two wings and the porch of the original Elizabethan house ; and proceeded to readjust them to make his new house. The south wing he was, of course, obliged to leave where it stood, partly because he could not move it without isolating the chapel, and partly because the long gallery with its elaborate plaster ceiling could never have been re-erected. So he brought the porch close up against this wing, and then brought Tanfield's north wing across to adjoin the porch on the other side. Besides thus telescoping the frontage to less than half its original length, John Lenthall also reduced the height of the gables and the porch. The whole roof, with the exception of the part above the kitchen, was lowered, and the topmost storey of the house practically destroyed.

From his own point of view John Lenthall, no doubt, did the sensible thing. He had on his hands a large place which, though it must have contained, to judge by the gallery or great drawing-room, some fine and noble apartments, was so enfeebled by bad building that to maintain it would have involved heavy and continuous expense. He contrived out of it a house for himself which was comfortable, in an early nineteenth-century fashion, and yet presented, with the re-arranging of the façade, some reminiscence of its past. Still, the effect of such drastic rebuilding could not but be disastrous to the general character and dignity of the house. While the front retains some picturesqueness, there is no side or back view which has any consistent outline or appearance of considered design. Every aspect save that of the façade produces a somewhat confused impression. Yet the house is not the less interesting for the marks it bears of the phases through which it has passed, once the signs of them have been made, so to speak, legible in its walls to-day.

CALENDAR OF THE RECORDS

THE CHARTERS OF BURFORD

THE originals of the earliest charters of Burford are not now in existence. Copies of them, however, are preserved on the Certificate made by the Burford Gild Merchant in response to the proclamation of Richard II, ordering all the Gilds to furnish returns to the Chancery setting forth their liberties and privileges, their rules and customs, and their possessions. The Burford Certificate is unfortunately damaged at the top, and the regnal year is missing from the date ; but as the first part of the date—xxviii die Ianuarii—is decipherable, and the proclamation was of the year 1388, the Certificate may be assumed to be of the year 1389.

It contains copies of eight documents, four emanating from lords of the manor and four from the Crown. They are not entered upon the Certificate in their true chronological order, but in two groups, the four from lords of the manor being placed before those from the Crown ; moreover, the first four, being undated, and the knowledge of the proper succession having doubtless been lost, appear in the order of their length and explicitness. Consequently rearrangement is necessary in order to present the chronological sequence of the documents.

The first charter is in its right place. It is the grant of liberties by Robert FitzHamon, which has already been discussed at some length.¹

The second document on the Certificate is the charter of William Earl of Gloucester. But it refers to two previous grants—made by ‘ Robertus filius hamonis avus meus et Robertus Comes G. . . ’—and its place should therefore be third, if a document can be shown which should precede it. This is clearly the case with the fourth on the Certificate. That one opens with the words ‘ R regis filius Gloucestrie consul', the style commonly used by Robert, the natural son of Henry I, who took so great a part in Matilda's struggles against Stephen. He married Mabel, one of the daughters of Robert Fitz-Hamon, and obtained with her the Honour of Gloucester. But he never seems to have used the ordinary style of Comes Gloucestriae. His charters, as may be seen by several examples in the Cartulary of the Abbey of Gloucester,¹ open with a style identical with that employed in this Burford charter. Therefore that document must be placed second in chronological order, and is to be dated between 1107, the year of FitzHamon's death, and 1147, the year of Robert's death.

The charter of William Earl of Gloucester, Robert's son, may be placed third, since the two charters of Henry II are in the nature of confirmations of liberties granted by William. It may thus be dated between 1147 and 1155, the probable date of the first charter of Henry II. It is not difficult to see why the members of the Burford Gild who drew up the Certificate placed this document second. It recites in full and confirms the charter of FitzHamon, and the two might naturally be copied in succession. The recital is fortunate, since we are thus enabled to reconstruct those portions of FitzHamon's charter which have perished by the damaging of the Certificate.

The charters of Henry II, fifth and sixth on the Certificate, should stand fourth and fifth. Both can be dated with some accuracy. One was given at Northampton, and the witnesses are Reginald Earl of Cornwall, Humfrey de Bohun Dapifer, and Warin FitzGerold Chamberlain. Now Eyton gives no instance of Humfrey de Bohun signing as Dapifer after 1158, and none of Warin FitzGerold as Chamberlain later than that same year. But before that year he only records two visits of Henry II to Northampton, one in January 1155, and the other in July 1157. Consequently the Burford charter must belong to one of those two years, and as other charters tested by Reginald Earl of Cornwall and Warin FitzGerold as Chamberlain at Northampton are attributed by Eyton to the earlier year,² and as also Humfrey de Bohun signs as Dapifer in the same year,³ there is sufficient ground for dating this Burford charter in 1155.

The case of the other charter is even more clear. The rather curious form of the dating clause, apud Chinonem in exercitu regis, is found in two charters quoted by Eyton, which he attributes to the year of the King's siege of Chinon in the war with his brother Geoffrey—1156.¹ It does not occur in the cases of any other charters given at Chinon in later years. Its occurrence here, therefore, would make the date of the second Burford charter of Henry II 1156.

This fact adds probability to the dating of the first charter in 1155 rather than 1157. In view of the chronological mistakes in the order observed on the Certificate there would, indeed, be no reason to speak of these charters in this way as first and second. It is, however, more significant that the Chancery of Edward III so arranged them in the Confirmation of that reign ; and the coincidence of this arrangement with the apparent probabilities of dating is not quite negligible.

Next in point of time comes the charter of Richard de Clare, fourth on the Certificate, but properly to be placed sixth. His father, Gilbert de Clare, had succeeded to the Honour of Gloucester, circa 1217 in right of his mother Amice, one of the daughters of Earl William, after the death of Isabella, the daughter who had brought the Honour by marriage first to John, King of England, and after her divorce from him to Geoffrey de Mandeville. Richard de Clare, succeeding his father in 1230, held the manor of Burford till his death in 1262, and his charter is therefore to be dated between those years.

The last two documents entered on the Certificate are also the first two of the series of original charters preserved among the town Records—the Confirmations granted by Edward III and Richard II.

Of the reason why the series of extant originals opens with these two—of the circumstances, that is to say, of the disappearance of the earlier charters—no account can be given. Dr. Plot makes a statement which would lead us to suppose that they must have been in existence in his day ; he states that he saw a charter of Henry II granting liberties to the town of Burford. Against that must be placed the fact that, in the Quo Warranto case of 1620-1, no earlier charter than that of Edward III was produced on behalf of the Burgesses in defence of the privileges they had been exercising. It is hardly to be thought that, in a case in which the defence relied largely upon the plea of enjoyment of the privileges from time out of mind, the most ancient charters extant would not be produced. In other words, the course of that case leaves us no conclusion except that the earliest charters had already been lost. Plot, not concerned with extreme accuracy in such a matter, might in one sense say that he had seen the charter of Henry II, after reading the transcription of it in the charter of Edward III.

Two originals of later dates have also been lost. The Confirmation obtained from Henry VI refers to a Confirmation by Henry V, but the latter is not in existence. As having some possible bearing upon this loss it may be remarked that among the charters is preserved a copy of Henry VI's Confirmation, with a note to the effect that this copy was sealed with the Common Seal of the town 'pro maiore securitate'. Unfortunately the copy is not dated; but certain circumstances give a clue as to the time at which it was probably made. The Confirmation by Edward IV, issued in 1475, recites only the charter of Edward III, omitting all the intermediate reigns. Henry VII, in his turn, confirmed only the Confirmation of Edward IV. There would thus be a very good reason why the Burgesses should attach peculiar importance to the Confirmation by Henry VI, since it included all the reigns thus omitted. But they would not have been likely to go to the length of making a copy, unless they had had a warning given by the loss of one of their documents. Thus it may be offered as probable that the Confirmation by Henry V was lost at some time during the reigns of Edward IV and Henry VII. The Confirmation obtained from Henry VIII included both the Confirmation of Henry VII and also that of Henry VI, establishing the whole series up to that date; so that the copy would have been less likely to have been made after Henry VIII's accession.

The other lost document of the series is the Confirmation by Queen Elizabeth. It is recited in that obtained from James I; and the charges paid for it are entered in one of the Corporation Books.¹

The instruments thus grouped under the general title of Charters of Burford are, technically speaking, of various characters, and hardly any of them can take rank as charters in the strictest sense. The earliest of them, in the absence of the originals, have to be classified by the form of their contents, without the guidance that might have been given by the shape of the parchments or the manner of attachment of the seals.

The first three, belonging to the rather obscure body of Anglo-Norman private diplomata, may perhaps be classified as charters. The Address in each case, though brief, is in general terms; and the grant is conveyed in Concessive rather than Injunctive form. What remains of the Charter of FitzHamon is enough to show that it can be regarded as a good specimen of the diplomata of the time, free from unnecessary verbiage, and only introducing a clause subsidiary to the main grant, with the phrase 'Et adhuc concedo', for the very definite and essential purpose of giving practical validity to the Gild Merchant grant.

The charter of Robert of Gloucester is, even for its period, a singularly curt confirmation of liberties. But it is on that account characteristic of so great a fighting man; and it bears, in such details as the use of the present tense 'concedere', instead of the past tense 'concessisse', and the single witness, sound evidence of its genuineness.

The two charters of Henry II are quite distinct in character, and the differences appear to give us a reason for the procuring of two from that King. The first is not a true charter, but a writ. It has the particular Address to the Bishop of Lincoln and the officers of the County of Oxford, and its formula is purely Injunctive. The second, with a general, though rather abbreviated Address, contains an Injunctive clause concerning the rights and liberties at large of William Earl of Gloucester, and goes on to a Concessive clause concerning the free customs and the Gild Merchant of Burford in particular. It may therefore be classified as a Writ-Charter. The confined Address of the former document suggests that it was procured for a special purpose. Taking into account the fact that Burford, while in the County of Oxford and the Diocese of Lincoln, was part of the possessions of a great lord whose main possessions were in another county and diocese, and was attached to an Honour in another county and diocese, it is not difficult to see that trouble may have arisen between the authorities of the two counties and dioceses. The geographical situation of Burford may have led to some invasion of its feudal situation; and the Writ of Henry II looks as if it were designed to correct some infringement of liberties.

From a constitutional point of view the second document of this reign, the Chinon Charter, is curious. It includes, in a confirmative writ to the lord of the manor, a direct grant of liberties from the Crown to men of the manor. At this period, when the niceties of diplomatic formula are still lacking in development, the phrases of a charter cannot be pressed too far; but there is at least enough appearance of a direct Royal grant in this charter to show how it came about that the Burgesses imagined themselves to be above the level of the purely manorial boroughs at a later date.

The charter of Richard de Clare is an interesting specimen of the period when, with public diplomata becoming more formal and regular in outline, private diplomata, owing to their decreasing importance, were losing in formality, and becoming, in so far as they were still formal, perfunctory. The epistolary inversion of the formula of Address, the absence of any recital of the nature of the grants confirmed, the addition of 'et multis aliis' to the list of witnesses, and the lack of any mention of a place in the dating clause, make it a poor specimen of a charter.

When, after a long interval, the Burgesses of Burford next bestirred themselves in the matter of their liberties, they found that the Royal Chancery had evolved a simple and comparatively inexpensive procedure for those who were not seeking new franchises—the system of Inspeximus by Letters Patent. As long as the borough lasted this system from henceforth sufficed for the Burford authorities, and with one exception the remainder of the 'Charters' is composed of a series of these Letters Patent, which call for no comment. The exception is the grant to the town of a second annual fair by Henry VII. This, though in the form of Letters Patent, is a true charter, with an Expository clause and a complete Dispositive clause; moreover, the Great Seal is procured not by payment of a fine in the Chancery, but by the process of a writ of Privy Seal.

In conclusion, the source, the sequence, and the character of the Burford Charters may be summarized as follows:

SECTION II

CALENDAR OF RECORDS PRESERVED IN THE TOWN

THE muniments of the ancient Corporation of the Bailiffs, Alderman, and Burgesses of Burford, which are still preserved in the town, are now in three ownerships. One portion, together with the maces and seals of the Corporation, is in the possession of Mrs. Cheatle, the late Mr. T. H. Cheatle having been the last surviving Burgess, and his father the last Alderman, of the Corporation. A second portion is in the possession of the Charity Trustees, who replaced the Corporation, and is kept at the Tolsey. The third portion, a small one, is in the possession of the Governors of the Grammar School, Mrs. Cheatle having handed over to them the foundation deeds of the School and a few of the leases of School property.

The main division of these muniments took place after the extinction of the Corporation in 1861. Before that event they were all kept in two ancient chests and a chest of drawers in one of the rooms above the Church porch. Thence they passed entire, when the Corporation had ceased to exist, into the possession of Mr. Cheatle.¹ By the Common Law, upon the extinction of a Corporation its property, in the absence of special provision to the contrary by the Act causing the extinction, becomes the property of the last surviving member. In the scheme of the Charity Commissioners, which abolished the Corporation, the provision concerning its property was worded thus : ' All lands, hereditaments, and other real estate and property whatsoever, heretofore vested in or held by the said Corporation, or by the Trustees or Feoffees of the above-mentioned Charities, or any of them, for the purposes thereof respectively, shall from and after the establishment of this scheme be vested in and held by the Official Trustee of Charity Lands and his successors in trust for the " Burford Charity Trustees " .' This clause contains no direction concerning the muniments. They were quite unnecessary for the purposes of the Trusts, the nature and extent of the charitable property and the objects which it was to serve having been established by two Royal Commissions and re-established by several Reports of the Charity Commissioners in the first half of the nineteenth century. Consequently the documents, following the course of the Common Law, became Mr. Cheatle's property.

A few years later, however, he made a division of them, handing over about half to the Charity Trustees in order to give them a share of the interest in these old records. Roughly speaking, the division appears to have been made on the principle of handing over to the Charity Trustees the greater bulk of the documents dealing with gifts to the Church and retaining those concerning property which had been more or less exclusively under the control of the Corporation. The numerous documents concerning the Royal Commission of 1738 and the Chancery proceedings of 1742 were divided into two parts, which in some cases duplicate and in other cases supplement each other.

The Burford Records were examined some years ago by the Rev. W. D. Macray, on behalf of the Historical Manuscripts Commission. But, as has already been remarked, only a very small portion of the Records can be regarded as true municipal records; and Mr. Macray, therefore, did not find it worth while to calendar many of them. The volume of the Historical Manuscripts Commission, Various Collections, no. 1, published in 1902, contains his account of the Records, with a calendar of the Charters, a transcript of the Roll of the Burgess Rules, and notes on a few of the more ancient grants of land and on later documents possessing a special interest, such as the one which bears the signature of the King-maker.

For the purposes of the Historical Manuscripts Commission it was not necessary to do more. But for the purposes of a history of the Corporation of Burford it was necessary to examine all the Records; and it was natural that the opportunity should be taken to make a complete calendar, and at the same time to reduce to order the mass of documents, which were in a state of confusion.

Classification of them was greatly assisted by the results of a previous classification. The Royal Commission which examined into the administration of the Charity properties in 1738 ordered, among other things, that the deeds and other documents then in the possession of the Corporation should be entered upon a schedule with a view to their better preservation. In the making of this schedule the documents were divided into several series, according to the Charities with which they were connected. Each series was given a distinguishing letter and the documents were numbered in chronological order. On the whole this classification was well done ; only in a few instances have documents been placed in a wrong series or out of their chronological order ; these instances are noted in the ensuing calendar.

The following is a summary of the Charities represented on the schedule of 1738, given in the order and with the series letter of the schedule :

(1) POOLE'S LANDS. Series letter P. Property bequeathed in 1500 by Thomas Poole, Citizen and Tailor of London, to the Burgesses, for the good continuance of the fraternity, the provision of a fund for paying the Chancery fees for confirmation of charters, &c. The earliest document is dated 1401. This series is a large one, owing to the fact that several documents not concerning these lands alone were included in it. Owing to the Trust being so specifically for Corporation purposes, and connected with the Charters, the Burgesses seem to have caused to be placed in this series all documents concerning in general their administration of the Charity lands, as, for instance, a copy of the Decrees of the Royal Commission of 1628, and the general Trust feoffments made in pursuance of the Decrees.

(2) SCHOOL LANDS. Series letter S. The Grammar School was founded in 1571. But many lands given to its maintenance at that date had previously been held for Church purposes. Consequently the documents go back to a much earlier period, the first of the series being dated 1374.

(3) CHURCH LANDS. Series letter CH. Property given or bequeathed for the maintenance of the fabric and services of the Church and the Gild Chapel. The earliest document is dated 1377.

(4) BRIDGE LANDS. Series letter B. A small property held in trust for the repair of the Bridge and the highways leading thereto. The earliest document is dated 1322. The property seems originally to have been given for the general religious purposes of the Gild, and no specific declaration of the use of the rents for the upkeep of the Bridge is made until 1560. There is, however, good reason for holding that the money had always been devoted to the Bridge. The date of the first document in this series is significant. It is the same date as that of the Letters Patent of Edward II, granting to the town for a limited period tolls on all merchandise passing over the Bridge to market, the grant being made because the Bridge was then in disrepair.

The occurrence of this date on the first document of the Bridge Lands series can hardly be a mere coincidence. It is more likely that the necessities of keeping up the Bridge, which had led to the issue of the Letters Patent, had also led to the gift of this property. The absence of any specific reference to the Bridge in early documents of the series is not surprising, since the repair of bridges was one of the customary objects of the early Gilds. But the Edwardian Act dissolving the Gilds and Chuntries would make it advisable to declare for this Trust a use that did not come under the head of 'superstitious uses'. Hence the declaration in the Deed of 1560.

(5) ALMSHOUSE LANDS. Series letter A. Property of which the rents were devoted to the Almshouses founded by Henry Bishop in 1455. The document numbered 1 in this series has nothing to do with the Almshouses. It is a letter from the Earl of Warwick concerning the Priory or Hospital of St. John the Evangelist. It may have been included in this series by mistaken association with another document signed by the Earl, the true beginning of the series, giving his licence as Lord of the Manor to Henry Bishop to found the Almshouses. This is the document bearing one of the only two known signatures of the King-maker.

(6) FIFTEEN LANDS. Series letter T. A small property the rents of which were intended to accumulate to relieve the burden on the town when a tax of Tenths or Fifteenth was levied. The earliest document is dated 1382.

(7) COBB HALL. Series letter GS. A house given in 1590 by George Symonds (hence the initials of the series mark) with the intent that the rent should be used to supplement the weekly allowances to the poor in the Almshouse.

(8) LENTHALL AND HOLLOWAY CHARITIES. Series letter LH. A combination of two bequests of money for apprenticing poor children, the combined fund being invested in land at Standlake. The earliest document is dated 1677, but the investment of money was not made till 1726, though the Lenthall bequest had been in hand since 1662.

(9) MULLENDER'S LANE HOUSES. Series letter M. A similar investment of a monetary bequest by Lady Tanfield. The property purchased was in Mullender's Lane, now Swan Lane, Burford.

(10) CLEVELEY'S AND HEYLIN'S CHARITIES. Series letters CL and H. Similar investments made in the early eighteenth century.

(11) WILLS AND GIFTS. Series letter W. A collection of wills and extracts from wills, the earliest documents being the complete wills of two Burford Burgesses, that of John Pynnock, dated 1473, and that of Henry Bishop, dated 1478.

It is worthy of remark that the documents thus classified about 1738 have been preserved almost intact. Hardly any have been lost.

It was, of course, easy, in reducing to order the confused masses of documents, to reconstitute the classification of the 1738 schedule as far as it went; and the bundles into which I have gathered the documents concerning the Charity Lands follow that classification. There remained, however, a large quantity of documents not entered upon the schedule. The Charters of the Corporation come under this head; they have been collected together into a single bundle. The bulk of the unscheduled documents were concerned with various inquiries into the Charity administration of the Corporation, and especially with the Royal Commission of 1738 and the Chancery Suit of 1742 which arose out of the Commission's Decrees. All these have been classified and sorted into bundles under the heading 'Commissions and Legal Proceedings'. A certain number of documents have had to be classified as 'Miscellanea'. Most of them have some bearing on Corporation affairs, but a few have no traceable relation to Burford at all. There is a small quantity of Apprenticeship Indentures of comparatively late date which were not worth calendaring.

In classifying the documents I have lettered the labels of the bundles to increase the ease of reference to the documents. A single letter has been used for the Tolsey Collection, and a double letter for the Cheatle Collection.

The same recital of the purchase of these properties and the same recital of charitable intents as in the deed, P. 22. Two clauses are added : (A) that when only three of the present feoffees survive they shall upon request made to them enfeof the four elder Burgesses inhabiting the town, the two Bailiffs, and the Steward, or such other persons as shall be Burgesses ; (B) that all conveyances of these properties are to be kept in the chamber over the Church porch, called the Burgesses' Chamber.

The deed is endorsed to the effect that the tenants attended on a given date and paid to Thomas Silvester one penny of silver each for and in the name of his rent. It is also endorsed ' Affeoffment of the towne lands among which Poole's lands are to the same uses with former feoffment '.

Note.—It will be observed that numbers iii and x of the deed, P. 22, do not appear in this deed. These two properties were conveyed to trustees for purposes of a free school by the ' late co-feoffees of the parish lands of Burford ' in 1571 (see S 20). But from the fact that they were obtained by Typper and Dawe in 1590 from the Crown it may be inferred that the title of the co-feoffees to these particular properties had been overruled. They appear, therefore, in the deed of 1599 as if they had not been conveyed before ; but having been, by the purchase of Merywether and Dallam, put upon a sound basis, they are then transferred to the school trustees, and appear in the separate school conveyances (see S 36, which is dated the same day as P 26).

All the town lands, as in P 27, with a few differences in the occupiers. The occupiers of number v (messuage with shop on east side of High Street) were now Simon Hewes, shoemaker, and Richard Dawson, sadler ; number x (messuage with backside and garden on east side of High Street) had been occupied, after Andrew Ward, by John Silvester, and was now occupied by John Cooke ; number xii (the Culverclose) had Francis Turner in place of William Townsend, and the holding of Thomas Bignell on the east of it is described as a ' tenement, garden and croft '. The purchase of the properties is recited as in the two preceding deeds.

Witnesses : William Webb junior, Richard Applegarth, Humphrey Webbe.

(B) The Commission next decreed that there should be a new body of trustees, consisting of : Sir John Lacy, Knt., of Shipton-under-Whichwood, John Dutton, Esq., of Sherborne, Edward Fettiplace, Esq., of Swinbrook, William Lenthall, Esq., of Burford, Hercules

trustees.

Osbaston, Esq., of Chadlington, Thomas Silvester, clothier, William Bartholomew the younger, mercer, David Lloyd alias Hewes, mercer, Paul Silvester, tanner, John Taylor, shoemaker, John Clarke, felt-maker, and Richard Taylor, tanner—all of Burford.

Enfeoffments were to be made in favour of this new body by :

Symon Chadwell, gent., heir to Symon Wisdome, surviving feoffee of Poole's Lands ;

Robert Walbridge, son and heir of John Walbridge, surviving feoffee of Church Lands ;

Richard Hannes, heir of Richard Hannes, his great-grandfather, surviving feoffee of the Great Almshouse and capital messuage adjoining ;

John Collyer, William Hunt, William Bartholomew the elder, Richard Hannes, Robert Jordan, Samuel Merywether, William Symons, William Webbe the younger, Symon Parsons, John Taylor, and Edmond Serrell, surviving feoffees of School Lands :

William Webbe the elder, surviving feoffee of the Fifteen Lands ;

Richard Allflett, son and heir of (blank), surviving feoffee of Bridge Lands.

The new trustees were to make a new enfeoffment when they come to be of the number of six or less, and were to choose for that purpose discreet persons of Burford and the parts adjoining.

Period of leases. In future leases were not to be for longer periods than twenty-one years ; but existing leases might be renewed for the remainder of their term, if it did not exceed thirty-one years.

An illegal sale. The Commission found that the capital messuage next to the Great Almshouse had been improperly dealt with. Mr. Samuel Warcopp had been allowed to buy for a considerable sum shortly before this date a very long lease, and on the strength of this lease William Symons had spent money on repairs. They were therefore to have special terms in the making of a new lease, if they surrendered the old lease without suit.

Fraudulent dealings. (C) The Commission next considered the case of the lands purchased by Merywether and Dallam from Typper and Dawe, who had obtained them by Letters Patent from the Crown. These lands comprised the whole of Poole's Lands, the Great Almshouse and house adjoining, the whole of the Church Lands, and two items of the School Lands (numbers ix and x in the above list).

The Commission stated that there was suspicion of 'fraud and cozen' in the obtaining of the Letters Patent ; they had been obtained on the representation that these lands had been concealed from the knowledge of the officers of the Crown at inquisitions into lands left for obits, lights in churches, etc., and ought to have been surrendered. The Commission found that there had been no such concealment, and that the Letters Patent to Typper and Dawe were therefore void.

Long leases had been obtained at small rents after the purchase depending on these Letters Patent ; these leases were also pronounced void. Yet since the lessees had spent money on repairs, they might, if they would surrender the old leases, have new ones from the trustees for the residue of their term, if it were not more than thirty-one years, or, if it were more, for the residue of the term at the new rents.

(D) The Commission made decrees for the rendering of accounts yearly. Accounts.

P 73. 6 July, 3 George II, 1729.

Conveyance by William Bowles, to Robert Taylor, baker, Charles Perrott, George Hart, Richard Whitehall, Matthew Underwood, Paul Silvester, and John Green. The charitable lands as before.

Note.—This conveyance was apparently made owing to the former one never having been properly executed ; there is no endorsement of delivery of possession on P 72. It may be conjectured, in view of the near approach of another Royal Commission, that the state of the management of charitable affairs in Burford was such that the more important of the trustees named in P 72 refused to undertake the office.

[P 74 to 79 missing.]

Note.—The two documents which follow, though included on the Schedule in the Poole's Lands series, certainly do not belong to it. No part of Poole's Lands was in Church Lane. The situation of the property described here appears to correspond with the situation of the Lesser Almshouse founded by Simon Wisdom, and the endorsement 'Domus Elimosinarius' on one of them would support this view. These appear to be the only documents among the Records which have survived concerning that foundation. It is interesting to observe that the semicircular shape of the close here mentioned may perhaps be just traceable to-day in the slight curve of the line of the Grammar School premises by the south-western corner of the Churchyard.

P5. 12 October, 1 Henry V (1413).

Conveyance by William Brampton, to Thomas Alys of Burford. A bakehouse in the eastern part of Burford in the upper lane leading to the Church on the north side of the said lane, next the tenement of Henry Spycer on one side, and it extends thence along the street to the door which once was of John Sclatter, and in the lower part the stable is built and abuts on a room of the said William Brampton between the messuage of the said Henry and the tenement of the said John Sclatter, and the close in the lower part extends in a semicircle inclusively to the said door of John Sclatter from the said stable.

Witnesses: Thomas Spycer, Henry Cotelar, Thomas Wynrysh, John Punter, John Iremonger, William Cotelar, John Baker.

Endorsed: 'Domus Elimosinarius'.

and captayne of Callais R. Warwyk

Endorsed : To my trusty and well beloved the Bailiffs and Burgesses of Burford And to every and eche of them.

Also : The Erle of Warwick's letter coppied out. The original itself included.

Note.—The original has been lost. The date of the letter can be approximately fixed by the fact that Warwick was Captain of Calais from 1455 to 1471. After the early part of 1456 he was abroad until 1459. Consequently this letter must be either of about the same date as A 4 (also dated from London), or after 1460.

A 2 and A 3. There are no documents with these numbers. The documents so entered originally on the Schedule were evidently noticed afterwards to be subsequent in date to A 4; they were renumbered A 5 and A 6 and the previous entry cancelled.

A 4. 26 February, 34 Henry VI (1456).

COMMISSIONS AND LEGAL PROCEEDINGS. I

SIXTEENTH AND SEVENTEENTH CENTURIES

Cheatle Collection, Bundle MM

5 July, 10 Elizabeth (1567).

Exemplification out of the Exchequer of a verdict concerning certain lands in Burford.

The lands in question were the following : one acre arable called Jesus Acre ; one acre of pasture in the occupation of the churchwardens, said to have been lately given for the maintenance of an anniversary in Burford Church ; one acre of meadow and a shurf in ' Heymeadow ' occupied by Thomas Calcott, given to maintaining a light in the chapel of St. Katherine ; a half-acre of meadow called Cakebred Land, occupied by Thomas Fryer, given for maintaining an anniversary ; a piece of ground called ' a platt of ground ' occupied by Simon Wysdome ; two acres arable in Upton occupied by the same, given to the maintenance of a light called the Torchlight ; a tenement occupied by Kenelm Chaunce ; a shop occupied by William Partridge, given to the maintenance of a priest to celebrate Mass in St. Thomas's Chapel ;

The Attorney General laid an information in the Court of Exchequer on 2 February, 9 Elizabeth (1567), to the effect that the lands mentioned had been given for the purposes named, that the jury at the inquisition held at Chipping Norton, 3 September, 7 Elizabeth (1564), had found that the lands were so given to the Church, and that they should therefore have been delivered into the hands of the Crown. The information laid proceeded to state that William Dalby and John Geste were trespassing in possession of the premises and converting them to their own use, and were so doing on 8 October, 8 Elizabeth (1565), and still continued to do so in contempt of the Queen and against her laws.

A writ was issued in pursuit of this information, ordering the attendance of Dalby and Geste at the Court of Exchequer, and they attended by their attorney allowed by the Court, John Marwood. They asked for time to reply to the information, and the case was adjourned. On its resumption at a later date Dalby and Geste protested that the information was vexatious, and denied in detail that the lands were ever given for the purposes alleged. They further protested that long before the inquisition at Chipping Norton, viz. on 20 June, 6 Elizabeth (1563), Simon Wysdome and Hugo Colman, Proctors of Burford Bridge, were seized of and in the premises specified, to apply the revenues thereof to the maintenance of the Bridge, and enfeoffed Dalby and Geste of the premises on the date mentioned.

The jury found on their oath that the premises were not given for the purposes alleged, and that Dalby and Geste had not been guilty of trespass.

The Court gave a verdict accordingly, with liberty to Dalby and Geste to enter on the premises.

20 February, 14 James I, 1617.

Orders made at Oxford by the Commissioners for Charitable Uses for the County of Oxford, John Doyly, Esquire, Anthony Blincoe, Chancellor of the Diocese, Rowland Searchfield, D.D., and John Hawlie, D.C.L.

An inquiry had been held into a gift, bearing date 19 March, 5 James I, 1608, by Leonard Willmott of Clanfield, of various annuities out of his farm and chief manor and lands at Clanfield to different parishes. Burford appeared on the list for a gift of £4 a year for relief of poor inhabitants living by their own labour and not relieved by the Poor Law.

The inquiry was held in the presence of William Willmott 'who pretendeth title unto the inheritance', and had apparently not paid the sums in question regularly. The Commissioners found that the sums were to be paid after the death of Leonard Willmott, William Willmott his brother, and Katharine wife of William Willmott.

Three documents annexed, viz.

i. Evidence of the death of Mr. Wilmott of Clanfield, 'Mr. Holmes, vicar, sayeth that Mr. Wilmott died the 25th of June 1608 in June next nine years'.

ii. List of recipients of Willmott's charity in Burford on Good Friday 1617.

iii. 'It is ordered by the Comysioners appointed for charitable uses whose names are hereunder subscribed That the Towns and Villages hereafter mencioned shall paye unto the bearer Bilson towards the chardges of the Comysion the Jurye and drawing the decrees and for other chardges theis somes followinge . . . ORDER OF THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Concerning the concealed lands.. Recites the arrears as in the Constat (Tolsey Collection, Bundle K, no. 3) and recbrds that Mr. Lenthall, being of counsel with the feoffees for the poor claimed that the lands were not concealed, but were heretofore given for the poor and were so administered as by the Decrees of the Royal Commission of 1628, and that the title to the lands was not claimed under the transaction with Typper and Dawe. It was ordered that, if the title were not so claimed, and if affidavit were made to that effect, the tenants and occupiers should be discharged of the arrears, the Crown auditor having laid his claim on the Typper and Dawe grant. William Bartholomew, one of the Burgesses, having made the necessary affidavit (Tolsey Collection, Bundle K, no. 2), the Court discharged the tenants and occupiers of the lands, and laid the arrears on Typper and Dawe their executors and assigns.

5 February, 1640.

Deposition by Leonard Yate in the Court of Exchequer with regard to charges in the Ministers' Accounts for £18 13*s.* 4*d.* for arrears of a rent of 13*s.* 4*d.* issuing out of a tenement in Burford in the tenure of Thomas Heminge, given for an obitt, and £9 upon the occupiers of another tenement called the Bull in the tenure of John Cooke, given for an obitt.

That £18 13*s.* 4*d.* had been paid to Sir Lawrence Tanfield and Dame Elizabeth Tanfield his wife for the period between Michaelmas 1611 and May 1627. The Court ordered that the Lord Falkland, as executor of the Tanfields, should be given a week to show cause why he should not pay this sum, the tenants and occupiers to pay the other sum in arrear.

Michaelmas Term, 20 Charles I (1644).

ORDER OF THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

The order demands payment of a sum of £18 13s. 4d. charged in the Ministers' Accounts for the county of Oxon, being arrears of the following rents due to the Crown :

A rent of 13s. 4d. a year from a tenement late in the tenure of Thomas Hemminge heretofore given for the maintenance of an obit, now in arrear for 18 years ended Michaelmas 14 Charles I (1638) and charged upon Robert Serrill, Thomas Silvester, William Hunt, William Bartholomew, John Ward, and Robert Jordan ;

A rent of 10s. a year upon the tenants and occupiers of a tenement called the Bull, now in the tenure of John Cooke, also given to maintain an obit, now in arrear for the same period as the foregoing.

The parties named pleaded at the Court that they, in trust for the Church of Burford, by the Statute of Charitable Uses, had paid the greatest part of these rents to Sir Lawrence Tanfeild, late lord of the manor, and after his death to Dame Elizabeth Tanfeild his executrix, now deceased, and after her death to Lucius Lord Viscount Falkland, her executor and owner of the manor ; and that they held the remaining portion of the arrears in their hands and were ready to pay the same.

The present order gives them time to look up their acquittances and notes of the transactions.

Lent Assizes, 1651.

Presentation by the Jurors to the Keepers of the Liberty of England concerning the ruinous condition of that part of Burford Bridge lying in the parish of Fulbrook, and asserting the duty of the parish of Fulbrook to repair that portion.

1686.

AFFIDAVIT by William Rogers of Burford, clothier,

That the ancient custom for the appointment of Bailiffs of Burford was for four persons to be nominated by the former Bailiffs and the Burgesses and presented to the Steward at the Court Leet within a month from Michaelmas in each year for the appointment of two out of the four to be Bailiffs for the ensuing twelve months :

that no Court Leet was held within a month from the Michaelmas last past :

that at a Court Leet held on November 2 four persons, viz. John Price, Thomas Silvester, John Haynes, and John Castle, were presented to the Steward, John Jordan, but that he appointed only one of them, John Haynes, and appointed to act with him John Payton :

that there were certain stocks of money and trust funds administered by the Bailiffs and therefore it was essential that they should be elected in the ancient manner.

AN OPINION of Counsel, Judge Levinz, on a case concerning the above, submitted by the Countess of Abercorn. A Mandamus had been taken out. The contention of the Lady of the Manor was that the presentation of four persons by the Bailiffs and Burgesses was only a survival from days when the Steward was a 'stranger' and ignorant of suitable persons to appoint, and did not remain good when the Steward was acquainted with the town.

18 February, 6 Anne (1708).

WARRANT addressed to John Sindrey and Henry Peacock.

John Sindrey, of Bedford, merchant, is ordered to pay the sum of £20 bequeathed by his grandfather in 1660, which had not been paid either by his widow or by his son.

Henry Peacock, executor of the will of Henry Heyling, gentleman, of Minster Lovell, is ordered to pay the sum of £200 given by that will.

The money to be paid at Burford on 25 June next.

Note.—This warrant gives the names of the Commissioners who held the inquiry at Witney in 1702. They were Sir Robert Jenkinson, Sir Edmund Warcupp, Manwaring Hammond, D.D., Henry Cole, Daniel Warwick, Matthew Prior, Thomas Abell, and Nicholas Marshall.

COMMISSIONS AND LEGAL PROCEEDINGS. II AND III

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

Cheatle Collection, Bundles NN and OO

1. 7 June, 1 George II, 1728.

Indenture of Agreement between Richard Whitehall and James Partridge, Bailiffs, Charles Perrott, Alderman, George Hart, Chamberlain, William Bowles, Robert Taylor, Matthew Underwood, Paul Silvester, John Green, and Daniel Dicks, Burgesses, of the one part, and Richard Griffiths of the other part.

The Agreement sets forth that the Lords of the Manor had by pretence of a judgement in the Court of Exchequer seized upon the profits of the markets. A judgement had been obtained against the Bailiffs and Burgesses in their private capacity. No Execution of the judgement was ever taken, and the Burgesses' franchises had not been seized into the hands of the Crown. But the Lord of the Manor had used the judgement to intimidate the Bailiffs and Burgesses, in order to possess himself of the franchises.

The Bailiffs had been advised to sue out a writ of error to reverse the judgement. The rents of Poole's Lands were held on such terms as to admit of their being used for such purposes (the protection of the town's franchises), but they only produced clear £25 a year.

The present Agreement therefore is to the effect that Richard Griffiths is to receive this £25 a year in trust, and also, if necessary, a sum of £10 a piece from the other parties to the Agreement, and an attempt is to be made to mortgage Poole's Lands for raising the moneys needed to proceed at once.

Witnesses : William Perrott, George Hart junior.

2. Two pieces of paper containing notes as to the ancient franchises of Burford, dated 1727, and evidently connected with the project outlined in the above Agreement.

3. THE ROYAL COMMISSION OF 1738

Not dated.

Verdict and Decrees of the Royal Commission of 1738.

i. William Lenthall's will. This had bestowed a sum of £50 to be added to £150 given to the town in his lifetime, the money to be lent out to poor tradesmen. He died in 1662.

The Commission found that the will was not proved till 1695. £100 of the whole sum had been put out on the security of land at Standlake and interest of £5 a year had been paid. The other £100 remained in the hands of the Bailiffs and Burgesses and no part of the money had ever been lent to poor tradesmen.

ii. Lady Tanfield's bequest of a house in Sheep Street of the yearly value of £4 for keeping the Tanfield tomb and aisle clean and in repair, 20s. of the money to be paid to a supervisor to see that this was properly done. Also a gift of £40 to bind poor lads apprentice at £10 each, the sum to be returned by the master at the end of the apprenticeship. Lady Tanfield died in 1628.

The Commission found that only £2 2s. 6d. had ever been spent on the care of the tomb, which was then in such disrepair that it would cost £36 9s. 2d. to put it in proper condition. The rent of the house had nevertheless been received by the Bailiffs all the time. None of the sum of £40 had ever been used to bind apprentices.

iii. Richard Hayter's charity, 1666 ; a sum of 8s. a year out of a house called Riches College on west side of the High Street, then occupied by John Robins, and a sum of 4s. a year out of a house adjoining then occupied by Thomas Miles ; the former sum to be given to 8 of the almspeople and the latter sum to 4 poor widows.

The Commission found that this charity had been regularly administered.

Also a sum of 6s. 8d., interest on a sum of 20 nobles (£6 13s. 4d.), the capital to be lent out and the interest paid to a Minister for a sermon on New Year's Day.

The Commission found that this also had been regularly carried out as regards the interest although no one had ever applied for the loan of the principal.

iv. John Harris's will (see W 13, p. 369).

The Commission found that the £100 to be lent to tradesmen had been administered properly except that the churchwardens had not been associated with the management of it. The second £100 for binding apprentices had been lent out, £50 to Alexander Ready and £50 to Richard Winsmore on his note of hand alone, and he dying insolvent the sum had been lost. One of the Burgesses to whom the note of hand was made out was a churchwarden, and should, the Commission held, have been more careful. The Corporation had themselves kept up the interest of £5 a year on the lost sum.

v. Alexander Ready's gift, 1616 (see W 10, p. 368).

The Commission found that a sum of £13 6s. 8d. had been lent to John Price, when Bailiff, and had been lost by his failure. The Minister had received no part of the 8s. bestowed on him by the will, and the charity had been administered at the Town Hall instead of at the Church as directed by the will.

vi. Cobb Hall.

The Commission had no comment to make, except that the premises were worth more than the existing rent of £13 a year. They put on record that Joseph Flexney had spent upon repairs more than was actually necessary.

vii. Gift of James Frotham, 1663, of a sum of 40s. a year from lands in Langford and Grafton, to be given to a maid-servant of six years' service, or failing that to be used to put out a boy or girl of Burford to service.

The Commission found that there was no complaint to be made, except that six years previously one of the Bailiffs, in bestowing the money, insisted that the recipient, a servant named Eliza Horne, should spend at his shop 20s. on things she did not want.

viii. Gift of Walwin Hopton of £50 to be lent to tradesmen in sums of £10.

The Commission found that the charity had been administered, but the accounts had not been read out in Church as they should have been.

ix. The School.

The Commission found that since 1717, when Richard Griffiths became schoolmaster, no usher had been appointed, the 'petties' (junior boys) had not been taught their A B C; no scholars had been registered. Griffiths had received all the rents, including that part which should have gone to the payment of an usher. The schoolmaster had not been elected annually, as Simon Wisdom's constitutions ordered.

x. Poole's Lands and Church Lands.

The Commission seemed chiefly occupied to prove that the 22 acres of arable land belonged to the Church, and maintained that this was proved by the Corporation and Church books from 1600 to 1689, and by a terrier of Church Lands deposited with the Bishop of Oxford about 1635 by the churchwardens; also by the book drawn up by Symon Symons in 1600.

xi. Gift by Henry Heylin of £200.

The Commission found this duly administered.

xii. The Commission found that £30 of the gift of £40 by Lady Tanfield had been laid out in the purchase of a house in Mollynder's Lane, and the rent had been used for binding apprentices, but not according to the will.

xiii. Robert Veysey's gift of £20, the interest to be given to 12 poor widows.

In 1705 the Bailiffs' books display £10 laid out in church repairs at interest, but no such payment appears in the churchwardens' books. Three or four widows, the Commission found, had received some money in sums of 2s. 6d. at a time. There had been no other payments between 1704 and 1727. Between 1727 and 1736 the whole interest had been disposed of according to the will, except that the churchwardens had not been consulted.

xiv. Gift by Thomas Collyer, 25 October, 16 Charles II (1664), of £2 12s., the interest to be laid out by the Bailiffs in bread for distribution to the poor.

The Commission found that this had been administered, but the overseers of the will had not been properly consulted.

xv. Gift by Robert Gilkes of Burford of £10, to be lent out.

The Commission had no complaint to make.

xvi. Willmott's charity (see p. 385).

The Commission found that this had been administered, but not strictly, and no account had been delivered.

xvii. Edmund Harman's charity (see W 4, p. 367).

The Commission had no complaint to make.

xviii. Gift by John Castle, 1720, of 10s. a year out of a close in Bampton for a yearly sermon on Good Friday.

The Commission had no complaint to make.

xix. Gift by John Lloyd of 6s. 8d. (see W 7, p. 368).

The Commission had no comment to make except that an additional sum of 3s. 4d. promised by the son of John Lloyd had never been paid.

xx. Gift by Ambrose Aston, 1722, of a messuage producing £3 a year, to be used for apprenticing poor boys.

The Commission found that this had been done up to 1724. Then a year had been missed. From 1724 to 1738 the rents had been received by John Jordan, and £25 had been paid out; the remainder he held ready to apprentice a boy when required.

xxi. Castle's Charity, 1726, of four houses in Gildenford Lane lying together, called Castle's Yard, to house four poor widows, and two messuages in Witney Street, and his garden, and two other houses in Gildenford Lane for maintenance of the widows.

The Commission found that this had been properly administered.

xxii. Gift by John Palmer of Bampton of £50, the interest to be given to the poor.

The Commission found that the money had been laid out in buying four houses in Mullender's Lane and the interest had been properly used.

xxiii. All Sorts of Money. Under this head came the following gifts: Timothy Stampe, £40; George Thomson, £30 (£20 of which had been lost); Alexander Ready, £40; William Edgeley, £10; Philip Mariner, £20; Edmund Silvester, £20; Attwell, 30s.; Ralph Willet's cow sold for 30s., made up to 40s. by Simon Wisdom, Reynolds, and Simon Symons. The total was given as £173 10s.

The Commission found that £29 16s. 8d. had been lost by being lent to John Price, who was one of the Corporation at the time. By the inquiry of 1702 the whole sum under the head of All Sorts of Money was ordered to be lent out in sums of £10 at a time, to be paid back by 20s. a year without interest. £125 was now out on 22 bonds.

xxiv. Gift by Elizabeth Meady of 17 acres to the overseers of her will; apparently invalidated by her failing to mention the heirs of these overseers.

xxv. Gift by John Hillary of £200, the interest to be laid out in bread for the poor.

The Commission found that £100 had been laid out in the purchase of land at Standlake and the interest properly used except in 1737, when George Hunt received the interest and had not accounted for it.

xxvi. Cleveley's Charity.

The Commission found this duly administered.

xxvii. The Almshouse and capital messuage adjoining.

The Commission found that the Corporation had spent between 1702 and 1738 a sum of £61 odd more than they had received. It did not appear to the Commissioners that the Corporation had any right to appoint widows to the Almshouses or to spend money on repairs.

Various minor points were also dealt with. The Church authorities complained that the Corporation had let a house belonging to the Church to William Bowles, one of their number; he had done no repairs, and after he left the house the Corporation put in an unskilful carpenter, so that it ultimately cost the Church £52 1s. 11d. to put the house in good condition.

A complaint was made that the Bailiffs had taken the rents of the houses of the Bridge instead of the trustees. Mr. Underwood was said to have received money for repairs to the bridge, but had not repaired it. By decree of the Commission of 1702 the Corporation should have received £2 10s. a year out of the Bridge Lands for repayment of a sum of £60 spent by them on the bridge. It did not appear to the Commission that they ever received this sum.

There was also an accusation of fresh entries having been made in the Corporation books after complaints had been made by Mr. Lenthall of the administration of the Lenthall charity.

THE JUDGEMENT OF THE COMMISSION was as follows :

Lenthall's Charity : The Bailiffs and Burgesses were ordered to refund the £100 spent in buying land, with £5 interest, and to produce within a twelvemonth the other sum of £100. They were also ordered to pay £135 damages, partly to Mr. Lenthall for their misuse of the money, and partly for the expenses of the Commission.

Lady Tanfield's Bequest : The Bailiffs and Burgesses were ordered to pay the sum of £38 9s. 2d. required for the repair of the Tanfield Chapel, and to pay £10 damages towards the costs. In future the sum of £40 was to be administered by the Minister, the churchwardens, and the Bailiffs.

John Harris's Bequest : The Bailiffs and Burgesses were to recover the £50 lent to Alexander Ready, to refund the £50 lost by Winsmore, and to pay £10 damages towards the costs.

Alexander Ready's Bequest : The Bailiffs and Burgesses were to produce the full sum of £40, refunding the sum of £13 6s. 8d. lost by John Price, and in future the Minister was to be summoned to share in the distribution.

Cobb Hall : Flexney's present lease was to be void and cancelled, a new lease being offered to him at a higher rent. The Bailiffs and Burgesses were to pay £30 damages towards the costs.

Frotham's Bequest : Matthew Underwood, the individual who had taken the 20s. from the servant girl, was to pay 40s. damages towards the costs.

The School : The rents, which in 1688 had been fixed at £21 12s. 8d., were now found to be £52 10s. An usher was ordered to be appointed at £13 a year out of these rents. Richard Griffiths was to pay £30 damages towards the costs. There being now no Alderman or Steward, the School wardens were to be supervised by the trustees, the Minister, the Bailiffs, the churchwardens, and the overseers of the poor, and these officers were to elect the schoolmaster.

Poole's Lands : The rents, after allowing for the payment of £2 12s. a year to the poor, were found to amount to £25 18s. Half of this sum was to be paid in future to the Vicar, the Vicarage, exclusive of Fulbrook, being of the value of only £6 a year. The Bailiffs and Burgesses were to pay £20 damages towards the costs.

All Sorts of Money : The Bailiffs and Burgesses were to refund the lost sum of £29 16s. 8d., and to pay £15 11s. 7½d. due to the Church. In general for the future these moneys were to be administered by the Bailiffs and the churchwardens, and not as hitherto by the Bailiffs alone or by the Bailiffs and Burgesses.

Bowles's House : The Bailiffs and Burgesses were to refund to the Church the sum of £52 1s. 11d. spent in repairs and to pay £10 damages towards the costs.

Bridge Lands : It was adjudged that the sum due to the Corporation had been paid though not entered on the Corporation books. The Bailiffs were to pay £2 8s. 7d. due on the Bridge Account.

The Almshouse : In future the widows were to be appointed by the trustees.

The petitioners and defendants were to share the cost of entertaining the jury and paying the clerk, John Martin (the defendants, the Bailiffs and Burgesses, said they would refuse to bear a share of this cost).

Since the Bailiffs and Burgesses, by taking to themselves the sole management of the charities, had rendered this inquiry necessary, and since they had done everything in their power to delay it, they were adjudged to pay £163 damages over and above those already specified.

The following new trustees were appointed by the Commission : Sir Thomas Read of Shipton, Sir George Fettiplace, Sir John Dutton, William Lenthall, Esquire, Robert Stevens of Kelmscott, William Wanly the younger of Ayford, Francis Potter of Burford, clerk, Thomas Godfrey of Milton, gentleman, Henry Walker, maltster, Thomas Hunt, ironmonger, Robert Castle, mercer, Samuel Patrick junior, clothier, Thomas Clare, innholder, William Lawrence, maltster, James Faulkner, yeoman, and Richard Willett, joiner—all of Burford.

It was ordered that in future, when leases of town lands were within twelve months of determining, notice of the same was to be given in church.

The document is signed :

Harcourt	Tho. Martin	Tho. Snell
John Cope	Sam. Adams	Jno. Goodenough
H. Pye	John Coxwell	Jam. Chaunler
Henry Beeston

4. Another copy of part of the same inquiry, but containing the Decrees alone without the recital of the charities.

5. A bundle of correspondence concerning the Royal Commission of 1738, especially concerning the attitude it would be wise for the Corporation to take and the degree to which they should recognize the authority of the Commission. The Corporation were evidently in the dark as to the manner in which Mr. Lenthall was proceeding and the charges that would be alleged against them as a ground for the issue of the Commission.

6. A bundle of portions of Bailiffs' Accounts for various years between 1698 and 1734, possibly produced before the Royal Commission of 1738.

7. A copy of counsel's opinion, dated 1732, with regard to Cleaveley's Charity, a difficulty having arisen in connexion with the new appointment of new Trustees.

8. 9 May, 16 George II (1743).

Copy of the judgement in the Court of Chancery in the case Bailiffs and Burgesses of Burford exceptants v. Lenthall and others respondents.

The judgement will be found in full among the documents of the Tolsey Collection (infra, p. 486).

9 and 10. Two small quarto volumes (damaged by damp) containing copies of the judgement, exactly similar to the volumes in the Tolsey Collection (see p. 486).

11. Copy of the petition of the Corporation to the Court of Chancery concerning the Royal Commission of 1738, and also some fragments of the depositions of witnesses in the suit of 1742-3.

12. A bundle of bills of the costs of the Corporation in the suit of 1742-3.

13. 29 November, 16 George II (1742).

Writ to Mr. Ingles, solicitor to the Corporation, ordering him to produce his books, &c., before the Master in Chancery to have his costs taxed, and also for examination as to payments on account alleged to have been made by the exceptants in the suit of 1742-3.

14. A portion (folios 1 to 30) of the pleadings in the suit of 1742-3.

Folios 1 to 4: Lenthall's bequest. Exceptants' case was that there was no evidence of deliberate misapplication of the money. Respondents' case was that there was such evidence, the copy of the will had been lost or concealed by the exceptants, and accounts not properly kept.

Folios 4 to 8: Tanfield Bequest. Exceptants' case was that the money had been properly applied. Respondents' case that the money had been received, but no work had been done on the tomb or aisle

The exceptants replied that they only had the management of the trust because the Trustees appointed by the donor had neglected their trust.

Folios 20 and 21 (sic): Harris's Charity. Exceptants' case was that the Commission had no power to condemn them in costs, and that the loans improperly made were not so made by the whole Corporation. Respondents' case was that this could not be maintained, and they alleged that the books of accounts had been altered by the exceptants to bolster up their plea.

Folios 13 to 19: Cobb Hall. Exceptants' case was that they had let the premises to the best of their ability, and that the Commission had no power to condemn them in costs. A considerable mass of depositions as to the letting of the premises and the repairs done on them.

Folio 22: Fretham's Charity. Underwood pleaded that the Commission had no power to order him to refund the 40s.

Folios 22 to 30: The Grammar School. Exceptants' case was that the Commission had no power to alter the constitutions of the School. Griffiths pleaded that he was not summoned by the Commission which therefore could not order him to pay damages. Respondents' case was that the constitutions had already been altered by the Commission of 1628 and could therefore be altered again. As for Griffiths he 'did privately withdraw himself from Burford and conceal himself in London until after the Return or Close of the said Commission', and the damages against him were reasonable.

Note.—The above document is not exactly the missing portion of the pleadings in the Tolsey Collection, infra, p. 509. The handwriting is different, and in this copy the pleadings with regard to the School run to folio 30 whereas in the Tolsey copy they end on folio 28. Probably one is a portion of the copy on the Respondents' side and the other a portion of that on the Exceptants' side. However, practically one is a complement of the other, and we have the pleadings almost complete.

With this copy in the Cheate Collection is one folio (22) of the other copy—part of the pleadings with regard to the School.

15. A few fragmentary documents connected with the lawsuit, including a copy of depositions by Richard Griffiths's son and his sister-in-law concerning his mental weakness and his departure to Oxford to the care of a physician.

16. A copy of Counsel's opinion dated 20 September 1790, concerning the responsibility for repairing the Bridge.

Exemplification out of the Exchequer.

Information had been laid by the Attorney-General Gilbert Gerrard concerning: Sixteen acres of arable land in Burford now or lately in the occupation of Thomas Offlytt; a tenement now or lately in the occupation of Philip Glover, lately given by Thomas Hynde for an anniversary; a piece of a tenement with appurtenances now or lately in the occupation of John Impe; a piece of meadow in Bury Orchard now or lately in the occupation of Thomas Fryer; and four messuages in Burford and a barn now or lately in the occupation of the churchwardens; all of which were alleged to have been given for the purpose of maintaining anniversaries within five years before 1 Edward VI; and that William Harryson and John Hunt, churchwardens, were trespassing thereupon in contempt of the rights of the Crown under the Statute of 1 Edward VI, as appears by the inquisition taken at Chipping Norton, 3 September, 7 Elizabeth.

The Churchwardens replied in the Court of Exchequer by their attorney, John Marwood, that the premises were not given as alleged, and that the rents were not being used for any such purpose.

Inquisition taken at Oxford, Tuesday, 18 February, 10 Elizabeth, before Sir Edward Saunders, Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and Thomas Carus, Justice of the Common Pleas.

The jury found that the premises were not given to maintaining anniversaries within five years before 4 November, 1 Edward VI, and that the churchwardens therefore were not trespassing, and were acquitted.

4. 15 August, 10 William III (1698).

Writ of the Court of Chancery, addressed to Sir George Rivers
Bart., Dorothy his wife, William Wallis, and William Smith. Concerning a gift by Thomas Collyer, late of Shoe Lane, London, brewer, by his will, of 52s. a year to the poor of St. Andrew's, Holborn, and a like sum to the poor of Burford, to be laid out at 1s. a week on 12 penny loaves to be given every Sunday to 12 poor children. The gift was charged on a certain brewhouse bequeathed to Thomas Collyer junior, in or near Shoe Lane. The money was duly paid until the time of the Fire of London, when the brewhouse was burned down. A Commission for Charitable Uses sitting at the Guildhall, London, 9 April, 1674, found that the new brewhouse standing on the site of the old one was chargeable with the annuity. Thereupon writs were taken out against Sir William Beversham, then holding under Collyer, and possession was taken. Beversham sued out an ejectment, but the debt was held due and the money was thereafter paid. Nine years before the date of the present writ Sir George Rivers and Dorothy his wife came into possession, and paid the annuity until about three years before this date.

The present writ, following upon legal proceedings, orders payment of a sum of £7 16s. adjudged by one of the Masters in Chancery to be due on arrears and £13 1s. costs.

COMMISSIONS AND LEGAL PROCEEDINGS. II

Tolsey, Bundle L

1. Copy of the Decrees of the Commission of 1702.

The Commission sat at the house of Daniel Slaymaker at Witney.

The Commissioners were : Sir Robert Jenkinson Bart., Sir Edmund Warcupp Knt., Mainwaring Hamond D.D., Harry Cote Esq., Daniel Warwick Esq., Matthew Prior, Thomas Abell, and Nicholas Marshall, gentlemen.

The jurors were : Robert Harris, Jarvis Ashworth, John Humphreys, John White, William Gay, Francis Clements, William Young, John Saunders senior, William Allen, Thomas Martin, John Spier, John Camden, Richard Tuckey, John Nabbs, and Jethro Bunce.

The Commission first recited the Charity Properties as in the Commission's Decree of 1628 and confirmed the Trusts.

The Commission next recites certain gifts made since 1628 :

i. Dame Elizabeth Tanfield gave a house in Sheep Street being the corner house on the west side of Lavington Lane, for keeping up the tomb and aisle in the Church ; 20s. a year to be paid to ' a sufficient housekeeper of Burford ' to see that this was done ; and the surplus, if any, to six poor widows of good reputation on Christmas Day.

Also a sum of £40 for apprenticing poor boys.

ii. Robert Veisey gave a sum of £20, the interest to be distributed by the Bailiffs and Churchwardens of Burford to twelve poor widows on Christmas Day.

iii. (Blank) Atwell gave a sum of 30s. for the use and benefit of the town of Burford.

iv. William Cleavelly gave a sum of £24 to be lent to four men for six years at £6 a piece. Also a sum of £20—uses unspecified.

v. John Palmer late of Weald in the parish of Bampton gave a sum of £50, the interest to be given to the poor of Burford.

vi. John Hawkins of Burford gave a sum of £20 for placing out apprentices.

vii. James Fretheram of Kencott gave a sum of 40s. a year out of his house and lands in Langford and Grafton to be given by the Minister and Bailiffs of Burford to a maidservant of six years' good service in one place; or failing that, towards the placing of a poor boy or girl as the Minister, Bailiffs, and Churchwardens should appoint.

viii. Richard Hayter of Burford gave a sum of 8s. a year out of one of his houses for eight almspeople; also 4s. a year out of another house for four poor widows; also 20 nobles to be lent at interest to any one in need, at the discretion of the Bailiffs and Churchwardens, the interest to be not more than 6s. 8d. a year which was to be paid for a sermon to be preached on New Year's Day.

ix. Richard Sindrey of Burford gave a sum of £20 to be lent to poor men in sums of £5, each to pay 3s. a year interest and this 12s. to be given to twelve poor people. The Commission finds that Sindrey left sufficient estate to pay this gift, his son John also left enough, and his grandson John, now of the town of Bedford, had confessed the debt and promised to pay.

x. Thomas Collier gave a sum of 52s. a year out of his brewhouse in London, to provide 12 penny loaves weekly for twelve poor children. The Commission finds that his brewhouse is still chargeable.

xi. Ralph Willett's gift of a cow, the proceeds of the sale of which, made up to 40s., had been put out to interest.

xii. The Right Hon. William Lenthall gave a sum of £100 during his lifetime to apprentice poor children; also a sum of £3 a year, 52s. to provide 10 penny loaves each Sunday for ten poor children and one 2d. loaf for the almspeople, and the remaining 8s. to the Minister of the parish. He also gave a sum of £50 by his will, the interest to be used for apprenticing children.

xiii. John Harris gave a sum of £200 to the Bailiffs and Churchwardens to lend out in sums of £10, repayable at £1 a year.

xiv. Walwin Hopton of Burford left a sum of £50, a debt due to him from Thomas Yate of Signett, to the Bailiffs and four Senior Burgesses, to be lent out to five tradesmen.

xv. Henry Hyling of Minster Lovell left a sum of £200 to Burford. The will was proved by Henry Peacock, and the Commission finds that sufficient estate was left to pay the sum.

The Commission records that the £50 given by John Palmer and £30 of Lady Tanfield's money and other moneys 'of the Company Stock' belonging to the Bailiffs and Burgesses had been laid out upon the purchase of four tenements in Mullender's Lane.

The Commission finds that Stamp's, Thompson's, Ready's, Edgely's, Silvester's, and Marriner's money 'do several times ly in the hands of the persons above mentioned to have the disposing thereof', and several of the sums after they are lent out have been likely to be lost and are often got in from the persons they are lent to 'by arrests and other great charges'. The Commission finds that it would be best for the recipients to have each the sum of £10 upon security for 10 years repaying 20s. a year without interest.

The Commission finds that the Bailiffs and Burgesses had laid out £16 on repairs of Burford Bridge, more than the Bridge Lands had brought in, and had paid £20 for expenses in recovering the gift of Collier; and had laid out upon repairs of the Almshouse £40 more than they had received. Altogether they were £76 out of pocket. They were willing to accept £60, and requested that £2 10s. a year may be settled upon them for four years out of the Bridge Lands and £10 a year for five years out of the Church Lands.

The Commission finally records that there were then only five feoffees of Charity Lands—Sir Edmund Fettiplace and Thomas Horde, Esq., who were very ancient gentlemen, Richard Bartholomew, David Hughes, and one Richard George, who had absented himself from the town and had gone into another town or county.

2. A small quarto volume bound in marbled paper, lettered E on the front cover, containing in manuscript a summary of the decrees of the Commission of 1739, with the exceptions taken by the Bailiffs and Burgesses under each head in their appeal against the decrees, and the judgements of the Lord Chancellor thereon. The following is a complete transcript of the volume.

Lenthalls Charity.

Willm. Lenthall Esqr. by will gave £200 to the Poor of Burford And directed it to be lent to Poor Tradesmen that served their apprenticeships in that Town free from Interest as the Heir and the Bailiffs of the said Town should think fit so that no one Person should have more than £10 and security to be given for repayment thereof at 7 years end.

The Bailiffs and Burgesses of Burford received only £125 of the said £200 of which £100 was put out at Interest on a mortgage of lands at Standlake and £25 in another purchase the Bailiffs and Burgesses not knowing what were the directions of the Donors will had laid out the produce or Interest in Apprenticing poor children.

The Commissioners of Charitable uses in 1738 Charge the said Bailiffs and Burgesses with the receipt of the other £75 and £135 for the Interest thereof together with £5 received for the Interest of the £100 placed on the said mortgage.

The Commissioners decree the £100 to be called in and paid within twelve months. And that the said Bailiffs and Burgesses do by sale of the purchased premisses or otherwise Raise the said £25—That said £100 together with £5 the Interest in the hands of the said Bailiffs and Burgesses. The said £25 and the £75 amounting in the whole to £205 should for the future be preserved as a fund and applied as the Heir at Law of the said Donor Wm. Lenthall and Bailiffs of said Town shall think fit according to the directions of the said will.

The Bailiffs and Burgesses Excepted against that part of the Decree which Charged them with the payment of £75 and £135 upon arguing of which Exceptions the Lord Chancellor ordered them to be allowed and the Commissioners Decree to be reversed as to that part thereof.

So that the £100 is to be called in—the land sold upon which the £25 was laid out and that £25 together with the £100 and £5 the Interest of the £100 in the hands of the Bailiffs and Burgesses making together £130 to be a fund and applied in lending the same to Poor Tradesmen that served their apprenticeships in the Town of Burford free from Interest as the Heir of the Donor and the Bailiffs of the said Town shall think fit so that no one Person shall have more than £10 and Security be given for Repayment thereof at the end of seven years.

Tanfields Charity.

Dame Elizabeth Tanfield by Will dated 23rd May 1729 devised to Willm. Lenthall and others trustees and their Heirs a messuage in Sheep Street Burford then in the possession of one Berry upon trust that they and the survivors of them should from time to time as need should require dispose of the profits thereof yearly for the repairing maintaining and Cleaning a monument in the said will mentioned and of the Isle wherein it stands—and also allow unto one sufficient Housekeeper of the same Town to be elected by the feoffees or the greater part of them 20s. yearly for his pains to see that the said Tomb be repaired and once in every year at the least and oftener if need require be made clean and the Isle be continually repaired. And the overplus of the Profits that shall arise in such years as there shall need no repairs or when it shall amount to more than needful to bestow thereon the same to be paid to the Hands of the Minister and Bailiffs of the said Town for the time being to be by them distributed on Christmas day in the Church immediately after Divine Service to six poor Widows of the same Parish who shall be reputed to be of Godly and religious conversation.

The Commissioners of Charitable uses Charge the Bailiffs and Burgesses with having received the Rent of the said House but had not regularly appointed any Person to take care of the cleaning and repairing the said Tomb and Isle but had suffered the same to run greatly out of repair so that to Perfect and Restore the said Isle and Tomb it would cost £38 9s. 2d.

Thereupon the Commissioners decree that the said Bailiffs and Burgesses shall pay the said £38 9s. 2d. to John Lenthall the Heir of the surviving Feoffee or Trustee and that it shall be applied by him for repairing the said Isle and Tomb And that the rents and profits of the same house for the future be received by the said Heir of the surviving Feoffee and after an allowance of 20s. a year to a substantial Housekeeper for the looking after the said Tomb that the residue shall be by him paid over to the minister and Bailiffs and shall be by them applied according to the said will.

The Bailiffs and Burgesses excepted against that part of the Commissioners Decree upon arguing thereof the Lord Chancellor ordered that so much of the said Decree whereby the said £38 9s. 2d. is directed to be paid to the said John Lenthall to be applied by him in Repairing the Tomb and Isle and whereby the £10 is directed to be paid towards the expenses etc should be Reversed.

And that the said Mr. Lenthall should appoint one workman and the said Bailiffs and Burgesses appoint another workman and that two such workmen should inspect and survey the said Tomb and Isle and make an Estimate of what it will cost to put the same into proper and sufficient repair and that if such two workmen cannot agree therein that then they do name an Umpire and that such repairs be made according to the Estimate that shall be made by the said two workmen or the Umpire and that the expence of such repairs be paid out of the rent of the said House then in arrear to grow due until the same shall be satisfied—and with these variations ordered that the residue of that part of the said Decree excepted unto be affirmed.

Harris's Charity.

John Harris by his will in 1672 gave to the Town of Burford £200 to be paid into the hands of the Bailiffs and Churchwardens of the Town of Burford upon trust that they and their Successors should lend out gratis to Ten such Tradesmen within the said Town as the Bailiffs of the said Town and the three eldest male persons above 14 years of age which should be of the name and family of the Silvesters in Burford or the major part of them should appoint by £10 a piece upon good Security to be approved of by them to be given by every such Tradesman to the said Bailiffs and Churchwardens for repairing the Ten pounds the yearly sum of 20s. for the space of 10 years then next ensuing into the hands of the Bailiffs and Churchwardens of the said Town. And that when £10 should be repaid into their hands the same to be let out to some other Tradesman in the manner before mentioned. And so to continue from time to time to be lent and repaid to the end of the world. And directs that if any of the said money should at any time remain in the hands of the said Bailiffs and Churchwardens the same should be paid into the hands of the succeeding Bailiffs and Churchwardens. And directs that if there should not be 3 such Persons of the name of the Silvesters living within the said Town at the time of such choice then the number of the said Persons should be made up out of the 3 senior Burgesses Inhabiting within the said Town. And directs that they should for ever Employ the profits of the other £100 in binding some poor Boy Born and living in Burford apprentice to some Trade yearly for ever The said Boy yearly to be elected as the said Tradesmen are to be elected. And directs that if any such Tradesman should die or in the Judgement of the majority of them be likely to become Insolvent That then the said electors should call in the money which should then become due from such Tradesman and that an account in writing how the said Charity is disposed of should be kept by the said electors and should be yearly in Whitsun week be publickly read in the parish church of Burford by the minister or Clerk there—And directs that every Tradesman who should receive any of the said £10 should pay thereout 6d. to be paid to the minister or Clerk who should so read the Account as aforesaid.

The Corporation received the £200 whereof £100 had been lent to Tradesmen pursuant to the Directions of the will—of the other £100 £50 was in Mr. Readys hands upon a promissory note and the other £50 had been lent to John Windsmore who became Insolvent.

The Commissioners decreed that the securities for £100 part of the £200 directed to be lent to Tradesmen should for the future be made to the Bailiffs and Churchwardens for the time being and that the same should be by them lent out according to said will—That the £50 in Mr. Readys hand should be called in and paid to the said Bailiffs and Churchwardens of Burford for the time being £50 Residue of said £100 lent by said Corporation to Said Winsmore and lost and that the Interests and profits of said last mentioned sum of £100 should be for ever applied by said Bailiffs and Churchwardens in apprenticeing poor Boys according to said Donors will That the minister of Burford for the time being should on Tuesday in Whitsunweek yearly read in the said Parish Church an account how the said Charities have been applied the preceeding year and that the minister should be paid for his trouble 6d. out of each £10.

Upon arguing an Exception to this part of the decree a variation was ordered that in the direction that the Bailiffs and Burgesses should be accountable to the Churchwardens of the Town of Burford the Bailiffs should be added to the Churchwardens.

Cobb Hall.

George Symons by his will in 1590 gave to the Poor of Burford his House with the Appurtenances there called Cobb Hall. In 1735 a Lease was granted to Joseph Flexney of Cobb Hall at the yearly Rent of £8 he repairing the same etc.

The Commissioners decree that the said Lease should be void and that it should be delivered up to the Feoffees therein after named to be cancelled—and Possession also to them and that said Feoffees should grant a new Lease to said Flexney if he should think fit for 21 years at £13 a year under the covenants in his said Lease That the rents and profits should be disposed of according to the Donors will.

The Bailiffs and Burgesses excepted against that part of the decree for setting aside the said Lease and upon arguing thereof

The Lord Chancellor allowed the exception and ordered that part of the Decree which was contained in such exception to be Reversed.

Frethems Charity.

James Frethem by his will in 1663 gave to the Town of Burford 40s. a year for ever to be paid out of his Lands in Langford and Grafton into the Hands of the Minister and Bailiffs of Burford which 40s. should be given yearly to a maid servant dwelling in a service six years not as an apprentice but an hired servant being of the age of 21 years And in that year wherein there should not be such a maid servant to receive it then he willed that the said 40s. should be bestowed towards the placing out to service a poor Child born within the said Town of Burford to be disposed of at the directions of the minister Bailiffs and Churchwardens or the major part of them with the good liking of the parents of such child (if any be).

Pools Charity.

Thos. Pool by his will in 1500 wills that his wife Parnell should have all his Lands and Tenements in Burford and Fulbrook for her life and after her death that the same Lands and Tenements in Burford should be put in Feoffment to such persons as should be of the most worshipful and honest Parishioners Burgesses of the abovesaid Fraternity to hold to them their Heirs and assigns for evermore to the Use and Intent that of the Issues and profits of the same The poor People of the Alms house should have every week 6*d.* to their refreshing and the residue of the same Issues and profits to be applied yeasly to the maintenance of the Priest of the said Fraternity and of such other things as should be to the good Continuance of the same Fraternity for evermore.

By an Inquisition taken at Burford 1628 It was found that a Tenement with the Appurtenances lying on the west side of the High street and 12 acres of arable Land thereto belonging A Tenement called the Talbot on the south side of Witney Street A Barn called the Woolhouse on the north side of Witney street A parcel of ground and close on the south side of Sheep street whereupon had been built 4 Several Tenements and also 22 acres of arable Land in the Fields of Burford Upton and Signett were given by Thos. Pool to the Intent to pay weekly with the Revenues thereof for ever to the poor People of the Alms house of Burford 6*d.* and that the residue of the Revenues of the same Lands (if any) should be employed to the maintenance of the Fraternity of the Town of Burford.

By a decree made under the Inquisition it was decreed that out of the Rents of the Houses and Lands called Pools Lands by reason of the Improvement of the rents thereof the same being then to be let at £9 6s. 8d., yearly and the several Lessees to be charged with the repairs of the same there should be paid weekly for ever to the Poor people in the Great Alms house 12d. to be equally divided amongst them and that the residue of the Rents of the same Lands should be Employed according to the declarations of the will of the said Thos. Pool.

Simon Chadwell who was Heir of Simon Wisdom the surviving feoffee of Pools Lands by Indenture dated 23rd February 1629 did grant and enfeoffee to Sir John Lacy Jno. Dutton and ten others. A messuage or Tenement on the west side of the said High street and 12 acres of arable land in the Fields of Burford thereunto belonging. A messuage called the Talbot on the south side of Witney street—a Barn called the Wool house—a parcel of Ground and a close thereunto adjoining called the Culver close or culverhay whereon had been heretofore erected 4 messuages together with the same messuages—and 22 acres of arable land in the Fields of Burford Upton and Signett which premisses were commonly called Pools Lands to hold to Sir John Lacy and others the said Feoffees their Heirs and assigns for ever to the charitable uses in the Decree of 1628 particularly mentioned.

The Commissioners decreed that the rents and profits of the said 22 acres should for the future return to the use of the Parish Church of Burford aforesaid and should be received by the Churchwardens for the time being and should be by them applied for and towards the Reparation of the same Church and that the Churchwardens should yearly account for the same rents to the Parish Church at a publick vestry on Easter Tuesday decreed the said 1s. per week to be paid to the poor people in the alms house according to said Decree in 1628 And decreed that the Vicar of the parish Church of Burford for the time being (Being the only Person that can be esteemed to stand in the place of the Priest of the said Fraternity) should receive out of the said issues and profits which amount in the whole after an allowance of £2 12s. 0d. a year to the Poor of the said Almshouse to £25 18s. 0d. a year one moiety of the said Lands towards the maintenance of the said Vicar and decreed the other moiety of the said Issues and profits to the good continuance of the corporation of Burford for evermore—according to the will of the donor And that the same Lands should be conveyed to Feoffees in Trust for the Use therein before mentioned.

The Bailiffs and Burgesses Excepted against the said Decree as to the 22 acres which the Commissioners had decreed to the Church and the applications thereof for the repairs of the said Church and likewise as to the dispositions of a moiety of the profits of the said Land or any part thereof for the augmentation of the Vicarage of Burford.

On arguing of which 2 Exceptions the Chancellor held them to be severally good and sufficient and ordered that the same should stand and be allowed and that such parts of the said Decree as were contained in these Exceptions should be reversed.

Fifteenths.

Three houses in St. Johns street and 2 acres of Land in Upton Field were heretofore given to the Intent that the rents thereof should be applied to repair the premisses and the residue to be kept by the Feoffees till any payment of Fifteenths or 10ths should be granted by Parliament and afterwards to be disposed of for the relief and Ease of the poor Inhabitants of Burford. The Bailiffs and Burgesses received the rents and applied them to charitable uses.

The Commissioners decreed that for the future the Bailiffs and Churchwardens to be chosen by the said Town of Burford and the Overseers of poor there shall receive the rents and profits of the said premisses and the surplus shall be by them disposed yearly on Christmas Eve amongst such of the poor Inhabitants of Burford as they shall think fit untill such time as Tenths and Fifteenths shall be Imposed again by Parliament.

The Bailiffs and Burgesses Excepted to that part of the Decree that directs that the Bailiffs and Churchwardens to be chosen and Overseers of the poor there shall receive and dispose of the rents and profits of the said premisses for by the Inquisition in 1628 it was found that the said premisses were given first to repair the same out of the profits And the residue of the said profits (if any) to be kept till any payment of Tenths or Fifteenths be granted by Act of Parliament and then the residue to be for the relief and easement of the poor Inhabitants of Burford or otherwise as the Alderman Steward and Burgesses of the same Town by their direction shall think fit for the common wealth of the Town which said premisses were by a Decree made under the recited Inquisition Decreed to be disposed accordingly and by another Inquisition and Decree therein in 1702 the jury found the same and Decreed the rents of the said premisses to be received by the Alderman Steward and Burgesses therein mentioned. And that the Commissioners had no reason or authority to vary the said former decree.

Upon the arguing of which Exception the Chancellor ordered that so much thereof as relates to the joining the churchwardens and overseers of the Poor in the Authority for distributing and disposing of the charity mentioned in the exception with the Bailiffs and Burgesses of the Town of Burford be allowed. And the rest of the said Exceptions be overruled and that so much of the said Decree as directs that the churchwardens and Overseers of the Poor should be joined with the Bailiffs and Burgesses of the said Town in giving the Authority for the distributing or disposing of the said Charity to be Reversed.

Heylins Charity.

Henry Heylin gave £200 for apprenticeing poor children. This was laid out in the purchase of lands in Clanfield and the Rents received by the Bailiffs and Burgesses and by them applied accordingly.

The Commissioners decreed that the Rents of the said Lands should for the future be received and applied by the Bailiffs Burgesses and Churchwardens to be elected by the Town of Burford and not by the Bailiffs and Burgesses only as had heretofore been for the apprenticeing poor children according to the decree in 1702 and that the same Charity lands should be conveyed to the Feoffees therein after mentioned by the (blank)

To which the said Bailiffs and Burgesses Excepted as to so much and such part thereof as directed that the Rents of the said Lands should be applied by the Bailiffs Burgesses and Churchwardens to be Elected by the Town of Burford—And likewise to that part thereof which directed the said Lands to be conveyed to the Feoffees therein named to be appointed by the (blank) for that by the said Decree in 1702 the Commissioners ordered that when the said sum of £200 should be laid out in the purchase of lands that the rents and profits thereof should be received and applied by the Bailiffs Burgesses and Churchwardens of the Town of Burford or the major part of them.

Upon arguing upon this Exception the Chancellor held it to be good and sufficient and ordered it to stand and be allowed and that so much of the said Decree as this Exception related to be reversed.

Decree in 1702 says in placing out two poor Boys apprentices being the children of such poor people of the said Town of Burford and do usually frequent the Church of Burford and hear divine Service or otherwise as the said Bailiffs Burgesses and Churchwardens for the time being or the major part of them shall think fit.

Dr. Castles Charity.

John Castle Physician by his will dated 1706 gave to the Bailiffs and 4 Senior Burgesses of Burford and to their Successors and assigns for ever 4 messuages or Tenements lying all together in Guildenford lane Called Castles yard with the appurtenances upon Trust that they and their Successors should for ever from time to time place 4 Elderly Widows of Burford who should be of honest sober life and conversation as (they should approve of) in the said 4 Tenements to be held in such manner as the same were then held by the then tenants and his will was that such 4 poor Widows should enjoy the said Tenements for their lives And he gave other houses and lands in Burford upon trust that the said Bailiffs and 4 Senior Burgesses should dispose of the clear rents after deduction for taxes and repairs towards the maintenance of such 4 poor Widows as aforesaid.

The Commissioners decreed that the said Bailiffs and 4 Senior Burgesses shall yearly on Easterday give an account at the publick vestry to the principal Inhabitants of the Town of Burford how and to whom they have disposed thereof in order to prevent any misapplications for the future.

The Bailiffs and Burgesses Excepted to that part of the Decree for that the Commissioners had no power nor had any just reason to impose such Terms as to the account in a manner not warranted by the Donors Will.

Upon arguing of which Exception the Chancellor held the same to be good and sufficient and ordered the same to stand and be allowed and that such part of the said Decree to which the said Exception relates to be reversed—And that the Bailiffs and 4 Senior Burgesses to whom the Charity is given do annually make up a distinct account of the said charity and from time to time deliver the same to the Chamberlain for the time being—And such accounts to be kept in the Chamberlains office.

Vesseys Charity.

Robt. Vesseys gave £20 the Interest therof to be disposed of by the Bailiffs and Churchwardens of Burford on Christmas day to 12 poor Widows of the Town of Burford.

The Commissioners decreed that the Interest of the said £20 should for the future be distributed by the Bailiffs and Churchwardens to be Elected by the Town of Burford for the time being according to the directions of the said will.

To which the Bailiffs and Burgesses Excepted for that they had no power to vary the directions of the said will.

Upon arguing whereof the Chancellor held the same to be good and sufficient and ordered to stand and be allowed and that the Decree so far as it related to such Exception should be reversed.

All Sorts of Money.

Timothy Stamp gave £40 Geo. Thompson £30 whereof £20 was lost with other Charities in the whole £173 10s. were thrown together into one fund called all sorts of money—By an Entry in the Corporation book in 1709 it appears that £29 16s. 8d. in the Hands of John Price was lost.

£173 10

By Inquisition in 1702 it was found that these sums did several times lye in the hands of the persons mentioned to have the disposal thereof—And several Sums were lent out according to the respective wills of the Donors were likely to be lost—And that it would be for the advantage of the persons that were to have any moneys by any of the Gifts that they should have the Sum of £10 each lent by the Bailiffs of Burford for time being upon security for the Space of 10 years and the Persons who should borrow the same should pay only 20s. per annum without Interest for the said 10 years unto the Bailiffs of Burford for the time being.

And by a Decree under that Inquisition it was ordered that the same moneys should be lent to such persons upon such security and payable in such manner as last before mentioned.

The Commissioners decree the Bailiffs and Burgesses to pay and make good the £29 16s. 8d. that was lent to John Price and was lost And that the £125 then standing out on said Bonds and the money in the hands of the corporation should for the future be applied according to the Donors will.

The Bailiffs and Burgesses Excepted to that part of the said Decree which orders them to pay and make good the £29 16s. 8d. Lent to Price and lost—and against that part that orders the said £125 then standing out on Bonds and the money in the hands of the said corporation shall for the future be applied according to the Donors will forasmuch as it appears by the said Inquisition that the said charities have been already settled by former Commissioners under a Commission of Charitable Uses in the year 1702 And to that part of the said Decree which charges them with having in their hands £18 13s. 4d. of the said Charity money whereas £13 13s. 4d. was only in their hands at the time of making the said Decree—

Upon arguing of which three several Exceptions the Chancellor held them to be good and sufficient and ordered them to stand and be allowed and that so much of the said Decree as the said Exceptions relate to be Reversed.

Bridge.

By Inquisition in 1628 it appears that 2 Tenements with the appurtenances on the East side of the High street of Burford were given to repair the said Tenements and the residue to repair the Common Bridge of Burford and amend the Highways adjoining to the said Town as the Alderman Steward and Burgesses of said Town of Burford and their Successors should think most Expedient for the common wealth of the said Town which premisses were then applied accordingly—And by a Decree thereunder It was ordered that said 2 Houses should for ever then after remain and the rents thereof employed for repairing the common Bridge of Burford and amending the Highways adjoining to the said Town and the Feoffees of the same to receive and Keep the same untill occasion require to disburse the same in repairing the said Bridge.

By Inquisition in 1702 It was found that the same 2 Tenements were given to the same Uses as before mentioned relating to the same and were so Decreed.

A Strip of land in possession of Mr. Silvester formerly was given to repair said Bridge and way.

The Commissioners ordered and Decreed that £12 8s. 7d. appearing to be the Ballance due from the said Bailiffs and Burgesses to the said Bridge on an account in the year 1738 exclusive should be paid by the Bailiffs and Burgesses to the Feoffees therein after named for the use of the said Bridge and way and repairing of the same and that the rents of the said Bridge and Lands should be applied by the said Feoffees for repairing of said premisses and the surplus for repairing of said Bridge and Bridgeway aforesaid.

The Bailiffs and Burgesses (amongst other things) Excepted to the latter part of the said Decree but the Chancellor held the same to be sufficient.

Holloways Charity.

John Holloway by his will in 1723 gave £200 to be invested in Lands of Inheritance in Trust that one moiety of the profits thereof should be received by the Churchwardens of Burford and their Successors to be expended in purchasing as many 2d. loaves as the same would purchase to be distributed every Sunday after divine Service amongst the Poor people of Burford for ever and that the number of the said Loaves should every Sunday as near as might be, be equal.

18th Jany. 1726. By Indenture of that date £100 part of the £200 was laid out in the purchase of lands at Standlax Com. Oxon which were conveyed to Jno. Hart Richard Whitehall and others for the uses of the will so far as relates to the Town of Burford.

The Commissioners decreed that the rents and profits of the said Lands so purchased as aforesaid should for the future be received by the Churchwardens to be Elected by the said Town of Burford and be by them applied according to the Directions of the Donors will.

The Bailiffs and Burgesses Excepted against that part of the said Decree as directs the rents of the said Lands to be received by the Churchwardens to be Elected for the Town of Burford only.

Upon the arguing whereof the Lord Chancellor held the said Except-tion to be good and sufficient and ordered it to stand and be allowed and that so much of the said Decree to which it related should be reversed.

Cheveleys Charity.

William Cheveley by his will gave £24 to be delivered to Trustees therein named In trust to be lent by them their successors or assigns to 4 poor Tradesmen within the said Town by equal portions for six years and then to 4 other poor Tradesmen for other six years and so in like manner for ever And that such poor Tradesmen should put in good security By Bond with sureties to the said Trustees their successors and assigns—to be allowed of by them for repayment at the end of every year—and in consideration thereof the said Tradesmen so holding the said money causing a sermon to be preached once every year at their own charges—within the Parish Church of Burford in the afternoon of the Sabbath next after the Burial day of the said Willm. Cheveley yearly for ever and that they should pay 4d. a piece yearly to the said Trustees their successors and assigns And gave £20 to the said Trustees and their Successors to be and remain among them for ever Whereof two of them to have it one year and Two another according to the succession for ever.

The Commissioners decreed that the said Charities given by the said Cheveley shall be received and applied by Sir Thos. Read and other the Feoffees therein after mentioned and placed out on Bonds in every respect according to the directions of the said will.

To which Geo. Hart Paul Silvester and Matt. Underwood Excepted as it orders that said charities to be received and applied by Sr. Thos. Read and others for they were the legal Trustees to receive and apply the said Charities pursuant to the directions of the will of the said Mr. Cheveley and no sufficient reason appeared in the said Decree for directing the Exceptions of the said Trust.

Upon arguing of which Exceptions the Chancellor held the same to be good and sufficient and ordered that it should stand and be allowed and that so much of the said Decree which the said Exception relates to be Reversed.

Alms House.

By an Inquisition in 1628 and another in 1702 It was found that one Tenement now called the great Alms house being houses and rooms both above and below together with one capital messuage with the appurtenances and also one lower room—One house called the Tan house and one strip of Ground thereto adjoining and belonging all situate in Burford on the Church green were long since given to the Use of the poor People of the Alms house of Burford aforesaid And were all given by Henry Bishop to the Intent to Employ the revenues thereof for ever to the Use of the Poor dwelling in the said Alms house.

By a decree made on the Inquisition in 1628 It was ordered that the lower rooms of the said Great Alms house with the appurtenances should for ever remain and be employed to and for the habitation and Lodging of 8 Poor people as the same had theretofore been used—and that the rents and revenues of the said upper rooms Capital Messuage Tanhouse strip of Ground and premisses then lett at £4 a year the Lessee to be charged with the repairs should for ever then after be employed and paid to and for the Benefit of the said poor People in the said great Alms House of Burford.

The Bailiffs and Burgesses received the Rents and revenues belonging to the said Alms house being £22 16s. 0d. a year from 1702 exclusive to 1738 exclusive amounting to £110 and have paid said poor People of the said Alms house and laid out on account thereof according to the Corporation books £171 19s. 10d. the Ballance being £61 19s. 10d. paid out of the corporation revenues.

The Commissioners Decreed that for the Future the rents and revenues of the said alms house shall be received and applied by the feoffees to be appointed for the charities Enquired into by the said Inquisition under that Commission who should also have the sole right and power of nominating and appointing the widows who from time to time shall be placed in the said Alms house.

The Bailiffs and Burgesses Excepted against so much and such part of the said Decree as orders the rents and revenues of the said Alms house to be received and applied by the Feoffees or Trustees in the said Decree mentioned—And also to so much and such part of the said Decree as directs the said Feoffees or Trustees to have the right of nominating and placing the said widows in the said Alms house.

Upon arguing of which Exception the Chancellor held the same to be good and sufficient and ordered that the same should stand and be allowed and that so much of the said Decree to which the said exception relates should be Reversed.

The Commissioners decreed that the charges and expences of entertaining the Jury and Bailiffs who attended on the Jury should be jointly defrayed by the Petitioners and Defendants during all the time of the Enquiry—and that Mr. John Martin appointed by the said Corporation to take down the minutes of the Inquisition of the said Jury under the Commission should be paid for his attendance and Trouble jointly by the Petitioners and Defendants.

The Bailiffs and Burgesses Excepted to so much and such part of the said Decree as orders them (Defendants aforesaid) to pay a moiety of the charges of entertaining the Jury and Bailiff and also to a moiety to the said Martin for his attendance for that the said Commissioners had not such power nor were the Bailiffs and Burgesses the only Defendants in the prosecution of the said Commission and proceedings thereon.

The Chancellor held this Exception to be good and sufficient and ordered it to stand and be allowed and that so much of the said Decree as the said Exception relates to should be reversed.

The Commissioners ordered and decreed that the Bailiffs Churchwardens Overseers and Constables of Burford aforesaid should for the future keep a Book wherein from time when and as often as anything should be done or transacted under or concerning any or either of the before mentioned Charities should be entered a full and exact Acct. thereof under proper and distinct heads and that such Entrys should be yearly on Easter Monday publickly read in the Town Hall of Burford aforesaid.

To this the Bailiffs and Burgesses Excepted and their Exception was held sufficient.

The Commissioners (after reciting that the Bailiffs and Burgesses had been remiss) Did order adjudge and Decree that the surviving Feoffee of the said several Charities or their Heirs should with all convenient speed by proper Deeds of Conveyance convey and assure the said Lands Hereditaments and premisses to David Lea and Nicholas Willett and their heirs who should forthwith reconvey the same unto Sr. Thos. Read and others therein named their Heirs and assigns To for and upon the Uses Trusts powers Intents and purposes therein before particularly mentioned and Expressed of and concerning the same respectively.

The Bailiffs and Burgesses Excepted thereto.

Upon the arguing whereof It was ordered that the same should be overruled as to the appointment of the Feoffees and that the continuance and future nomination of the said Feoffees should be according to the Decree of 1629.

The Commissioners Decreed that the Bailiffs and Burgesses should make and deliver a Schedule of all Deeds wills minutes and records whatsoever belonging to the said charities to the Feoffees within 6 months also notice of the enrolement of the Decree—And that the said Deeds and writings should be kept in such places as the new Feoffees should direct and appoint.

The Bailiffs and Burgesses did Except against that part of the Decree for that the making of such Schedule would be a matter of great labour and expence upon them who denyed. That they had not been guilty of any of the frauds misapplication or misemployments in the said Inquisition found or in the said Decree adjudged.

Upon the arguing of this Exception it was ordered that it be added to the said Decree that the Expences of making the Schedule be defrayed out of the Rents and profits of the respective Charity Estates and that the Schedules be respectively delivered within 12 months from that time.

Hoptons Charity.

William Hopton by his will gave to the Town of Burford £50 to be paid to the Bailiffs and 4 Senior Burgesses of Burford who should lend forth the same to 5 poor Tradesmen living in Burford by £10 a piece taking good Security by Bond of the penalty of £20 with 2 sureties for the payment thereof by 20s. a year for 10 years from the date of the said Bond—And when the sum of £10 should be received by the same Bailiffs and Senior Burgesses the same should be lent forth again to one other Tradesman he giving such Security as aforesaid—And directs that the same £50 should for ever remain to the Uses aforesaid and be lent forth in manner aforesaid And directs that any to whom the said money should be lent or any of the sureties for the same should die or become insolvent that then some other person should be procured to be bound for the remainder of the said Sum instead of the person so dying or becoming insolvent And that the same Bailiffs and Burgesses should in or about Easter yearly for ever cause to be made a note in writing by their officer and therein set forth in whose hands the said several sums of money were and who were their sureties for the same and procure the same to be openly read in the Church of Burford upon the Sunday after Easter day after Evening prayer yearly for ever by the Minister or Curate there and that the several Persons that should have the said Ten pounds lent them as aforesaid should severally pay yearly so long as they

3. A thin folio volume, bound in grey paper, containing another copy, in identical terms, of the decrees of the Commission of 1738 with the exceptions taken by the Bailiffs and Burgesses and the judgements of the Lord Chancellor thereon.

The only point of difference between this and the quarto volume transcribed above is that the index summary, which concludes the quarto volume, is placed at the beginning of the thin folio, and includes some charities not mentioned in the index of the quarto volume. They are as follows :

Lenthals Charity. This Remains to be Applied by the Heir of the Donor and the Bailiffs of Burford.

Tanfolds. The Bailiffs and Burgesses must Appoint Workmen to View and Estimate the Repairs of the Tomb and Isle and when the Tomb and Isle Repaired and a person appointed to look after the same and his salary and the Repairs paid for the Residue of the Rents of the House given for such Repairs of the Tomb is to be paid over to the Minister and Bailiffs of Burford and by them Applied according to the will.

Heylin. This seems to be wholly under the direction of the Bailiffs and Burgesses and Churchwardens as to the putting out Boys Apprentices.

Dr. Castle. This is under the Directions of the Bailiffs and four Senior Burgesses.

4. A thin folio volume, bound in vellum, containing a third copy of the decrees of the Commission of 1738, with notes in the margins obviously written from the point of view of John Lenthall and those who acted with him in attacking the management of the charities. Indeed some of the notes are actually in John Lenthall's handwriting. The general tenor of the notes is that the Bailiffs and Burgesses had usurped the sole management of trusts over which they had no right to be supreme ; that they had misapplied money, and in one or two cases were open to a suspicion of actual embezzlement ; that they had lost certain sums by carelessness and disregard of the donors' directions ; that they had let trust property fall into ruin ; and that in general they only disposed of the charity money to those who would be subservient to them, and would spend money at their shops.

5. A portion—folios 28–65—of a MS. copy of the pleadings in the lawsuit following the Commission, The Bailiffs and Burgesses of Burford Exceptants v. John Lenthall, Esq. and others Respondents.

Folio 28 (the end of the pleadings with regard to the Grammar School) contains a summary of the depositions of some witnesses as to the neglected state of the School and the mental condition of Mr Richard Griffiths.

Folio 29—The Fifteen Lands. The respondents' answer to the exceptants' case was that the rents of the houses being ultimately for the benefit of the town at large, the churchwardens and overseers were quite properly joined by the decree to the Bailiffs and Burgesses in administering the property ; that there had not been for some time any Alderman or Steward, and the Bailiffs and Burgesses had no sole right in the property ; and that the decree of 1628 appointed the feoffees to receive the rents.

Folio 30—Heylin's Charity. This folio is interesting as revealing the feelings at the back of the dispute. The exceptants' case with regard to the joining of 'the churchwardens to be elected by the town of Burford' in the administration was that, there being four churchwardens—one appointed by the Rector, one by the Vicar, and two by the town—the two appointed by the town were 'always under the influence of the Lord of the Manor John Lenthall Esq and for this reason the exceptants apprehend the other two are excluded by the Commission's decree'.

Folios 31 & 32—Castle Charity. The respondents remark that they cannot conceive why the Bailiffs and Burgesses should object to giving an account, if they intend to administer the property justly.

Folio 32—Veysey Charity. Another interesting point about the churchwardens is made. The Bailiffs and Burgesses claimed the right to elect one of the two town churchwardens. The respondents' answer was that of the four the one chosen by the Rector was appointed for a 'Tything outside the said Borough' which had separate officers and made separate rates, the one chosen by the Vicar was the normal Vicar's warden, and the remaining two were chosen by the inhabitants at large and no one by the Bailiffs and Burgesses alone. It appears from the summary of depositions on this point (Evidence of Henry Walker, Fol. 33) that the outward tything was Upton and Signett. The exceptants do not seem to have pursued their point, but fell back again on the suspicion of the town wardens as being under the influence of Mr Lenthall.

Folios 33 to 35—All Sorts of Money. The respondents had no serious answer to make to the case of the exceptants' plea that the Corporation lands had been by a former decree made liable for recouping losses.

Folios 36 to 44—The Church Lands. The pleadings, mostly concerned with the damage done to Bowls's house, consist of directly contradictory evidence as to the responsibility for payments made or not made in the past.

Folios 44 to 48—The Bridge Lands. Similar counter-pleas and evidence with regard to payments alleged to have been made and the sum claimed by the Corporation as excess of expenditure over receipts. The two parties were in direct opposition as to the validity of entries in the Corporation books and the respondents alleged deliberate falsification of the books. There was dispute as to the due receipt of rents in the past, and some uncertainty as to the tenants of Bridge Land houses.

Folios 48 to 50—Holloway's Charity. The same points raised as on Folio 32 with regard to the appointment of the town churchwardens to receive the rents. The respondents raised the new point that the town churchwardens were the proper persons to appoint since the warden for the outward tything was in no way concerned with town affairs.

In this charity Hart pleaded that there was not sufficient evidence to charge him with the repayment of £5 which had been lost. He could have shown receipts for £4 and 20s. had been applied to 'another charity'.

Folios 50 & 51—Counter-pleas on the point that the Commission had no authority to over-ride a donor's appointment of Trustees and to order the payment of rents to the general body of Trustees.

Folios 52 to 54—The Almshouse. The same pleas by the exceptants against the power of the Commission to place the receipt of rents and the appointment of poor widows to the Almshouse in the hands of the general body of Trustees. The respondents declined to accept the Corporation books as sufficient evidence of the right of the Bailiffs and Burgesses to assume control of this charity; and pleaded that the Bailiffs and Burgesses had 'misbehaved themselves' in the matter of admissions to the Almshouse.

Folios 55 to 57. Pleadings with regard to the payment of the Commission's charges. The respondents' case was that there had been an agreement between the two parties to share the costs.

Folios 57 & 58. The infliction of £163 damages on the Bailiffs and Burgesses. Exceptants denied that they had obstructed the enquiry and contested the power of the Commission to order the payment of damages. The respondents affirmed that there had been deliberate refusal or neglect to produce deeds and documents needed for the purposes of the enquiry.

Folios 59 & 60. Order for the keeping of a book recording transactions in connexion with charity property and for the annual reading of accounts on Easter Monday at the Town Hall. The pleadings on this point are important in view of a dispute that arose as late as 1899 with regard to the ownership of the Tolsey. The exceptants say 'that ye sd Town Hall is the freehold of the exceptants and not within ye authority or jurisdiction of ye sd Comm^{rs} to order or direct anything to be done therein'. Respondents 'insist that the same was built by and at ye expence of ye Inhabitants of ye sd Borough & other contributors thereto and Intended and designd for ye Publick good and convenience of ye sd Town and that ye sd exceptants have no freehold or Interest therein and that there is no just foundation for their exception in relation thereto'. The depositions for the exceptants relate to the ordering by the Bailiffs of repairs to the Tolsey and to payment for work done being made by the Bailiffs or some other of the Burgesses. Respondents only produced one witness who said that he did not know at whose expense the Tolsey was built.

Folios 60 to 62. Order appointing new Trustees. The exceptants relied on the appointment of Trustees made after the Commission of 1702. The respondents objected to the validity of that appointment as not having been made either by Mr Lenthall and Wm Bowls as surviving feoffees nor by the Bailiffs and Burgesses 'in their corporate capacity'. There was again dispute as to the power of the Commission to make orders over-ruling previous appointments.

Folios 62 & 63. Order as to the making of a schedule of the deeds and documents concerning charity property. The exceptants pleaded the expense of such a schedule. The respondents urge that the order should be enforced to prevent papers in future being 'secreted and concealed'.

On Folio 63 is the following: 'Note all ye feoffees of ye Charity Lands given to ye Town of Burford that are now living are ye Respondents

John Lenthal Esq., Paul Silvester, Matthew Underwood, John Green, Daniel Dicks Burgesses of ye sd Town of Burford'.

Folios 64 & 65. The beginning of the pleadings as to Pool's Lands. The document gets no further than the recital of the decree, and ends in the middle of a sentence.

6. Various bills of costs in the proceedings made out by Mr Ingles, solicitor, to Silvester, Underwood, Green and others, and the Bailiffs and Burgesses. 1738 to 1742.

7. A letter to Thomas Wainewright, solicitor, signed by J. Castle, Thos. Tash, and John Tash, authorizing him to pay money due for rent and arrears of rent.

8. A list of names of Trustees.

9. A copy of pleadings on the hearing as to costs of the action in Chancery, 9 May, 1743. The exceptants, besides a plea that the attack on the management of the charities had been vexatious and only designed to transfer the power over them into other channels, pleaded also that the enquiry had gone on so unreasonably long that their undertaking to pay a share of the costs could not be enforced upon them.

10. An Indenture Tripartite, dated 21 December, 25 George II, 1751, settling the incidence of the costs among those who had taken the action leading to the appointment of the Commission.

The indenture is between : William Upstone of Burford, maltster, of the first part ; John Lenthal of Burford Esquire, Samuel Patrick of Burford, clothier, and Thomas Clare of Burford, innholder, of the second part ; Robert Castell of Burford, glover, executor of the late William Castell, Edward Chavasse of Burford, innholder, John Andrews of Burford, clothier, Elizabeth Faulkner of Burford, widow, and John Faulkner of Burford, yeoman, executrix and executor of the late John Faulkner, William Griffin of Blackbourton, yeoman, executor of the late James Griffin, and Simon Badger of Burford, mason, of the third part.

The indenture sets out that whereas on or about 29 May, 1737, at a full vestry then held for the parish of Burford in the parish church there, 'it was agreed by general consent that a Commission of Charitable Uses should be sued out and that the churchwardens and overseers should be empowered to sue out the Commission' ; and whereas Thomas Clare, Samuel Patrick, and the late John Faulkner, then churchwardens, and James Griffin and William Upstone, then overseers, did by writing on 17 June 1737 authorise Alexander Ready of Filkins, gentleman, to procure a Commission and engaged to pay his fees ; and whereas John Lenthall, Clare, Patrick, Upstone, Andrews, Castell, Chavasse, William Lenthall, Francis Potter, then Vicar of Burford, Thomas Hunt of Burford, brazier, Edward Deane of Burford, weaver, Henry Walker, John Faulkner, James Griffin, William Castell, and John Patrick—the nine last-named all since deceased—petitioned the Lord Chancellor for a Commission ; and whereas the Commission sat and made decrees, to which the Bailiffs and Burgesses made exceptions, and a case was heard by the Lord Chancellor, who gave judgement in May 1743 ; and whereas Alexander Ready sent in a bill for £719 13s. to William Upstone, and subsequently took out a writ against him for the money ; and whereas Upstone in Hilary Term 1749 entered a suit firstly against Alexander Ready asking for the taxation of his bill of costs, and secondly against Lenthall and all the rest of the parties named above asking that they be ordered to pay their shares of the costs ; and whereas the parties had agreed to come to terms ; the present indenture witnesses that in consideration of the payment to John Lenthall of the sum of £210 in the following shares :

Robert Castell (as executor) .	9	14	1
Upstone	26	19	5
Chavasse	23	5	5
Andrews	33	5	5
Castell (for himself)	26	19	5
E. and J. Faulkner	23	5	5
Griffin	33	5	5
Badger	33	5	5

Lenthall, Patrick, and Clare undertake to pay to Alexander Ready all his claims upon Upstone, Castell and the rest ; and Lenthall also acquits Upstone and the rest of all his claim upon them in connexion with a sum of £273 18s. paid to the Bailiffs and Burgesses on account of costs.

Witnesses : D. Lea, James Chavasse.

Enclosed with this indenture are various documents bearing on the agreement—a copy of Lenthall's receipt for the £210, the original authority to Ready signed by Patrick and the others, Ready's full acquittance, dated 20 December, 1751, for his charges and his written consent to the dismissal of the case brought against him by Upstone, a receipt by one Martin (who had acted as secretary to the Commission) for £20, etc., etc.

NINETEENTH-CENTURY DOCUMENTS. I

Tolsey, Bundle N

1. A packet of papers relating to the conveyance of the Burford Charity properties to new Trustees by the Rev. James Knollis in 1827.

A difficulty had arisen in this way. The Hon. and Rev. Francis Knollis had been left sole surviving feoffee of those appointed in 1776.¹ He had died intestate, and the Rev. James Knollis, as his heir at law, entered into responsibility for the Charity properties. His natural course would have been to appoint new Trustees, but it was discovered that the decrees of Royal Commissions regulating the Burford Charities made no provision for the appointment of new Trustees by the heir at law of a sole survivor.

Counsel's opinion was taken of Mr. T. C. Treslove, Lincoln's Inn. The case as submitted to him throws some significant sidelights upon the management of the charities at this time. One of the principal tenants of charity property was one Tuckwell, 'leading member of the Burford Corporation', who held the chief part of Pool's Land and some Church Land. He was at least seven years in arrear with his rents and was estimated to owe about £400. All the other charity tenants were also in arrear. Counsel is warned that one of the dangers is that, unless the disposition of the Trusts by Mr. James Knollis is flawless in law, the tenants, especially Tuckwell, will take advantage of any irregularity to escape payment of arrears. Mr Knollis confessed himself in ignorance as to who received the rents and when they were last paid (letter from him to Mr. Price, solicitor, Burford, 20 Sept. [1826]). The Hon. and Rev. Francis Knollis had, some twelve months before his death, taken steps to appoint new Trustees, and had made a list of twelve suggested feoffees, 'unconnected with the Corporation thereby meeting the views and wishes of the Commission'; a draft feoffment was made, but Mr. Knollis was growing increasingly feeble and never returned the draft.

Another important point submitted to counsel was about the collection of rents in arrear. His opinion was that these must be collected by the heir at law of the last surviving feoffee; the new feoffees could not claim them.

Ultimately it was decided that the best way to proceed would be by petition to the Master of the Rolls for authority to nominate new Trustees. This course had been rendered possible by a recent Act of Parliament (Sir Samuel Romilly's Act) for an easier way of redressing anything amiss with charity trusts. Previously the only way had been to lay an information with the Attorney General, which was a troublesome and expensive process (see letter from Mr. James Knollis to the Corporation 20 Sept. 1826).

A copy of the petition to the Master of the Rolls, signed by William John Lenthall, William Ward, and William Hine, requesting him to order one of the Masters in Chancery to consider a draft list of feoffees and authorize the transfer of the Charity properties to them, is in the packet. So also is a copy of the order made thereupon by a Master in Chancery giving the necessary authority.

On 21 April 1827 the Rev. James Knollis writes to Mr. Price giving him a list of the persons he nominates as feoffees. They are the persons named in the conveyance of 1827, Bundle M, no. 2. Mr. Knollis says he has been careful to choose 'three persons out of each of the four classes of society'. Evidently he means the upper class with the title of Esquire, the clergy, the 'gentlemen', and those he calls 'respectable inhabitants'. It appears from some correspondence that an attempt had been made to persuade the Bishop of Oxford to accept nomination.

Tuckwell's final account is in the packet, dated 29 Nov. 1827. Presumably other arrears were paid on occasions when the Rev. James Knollis came to Burford to settle up the Trust business. There is much correspondence concerning these visits. There is also a good deal of correspondence with Tuckwell with regard to his rendering an account.

NINETEENTH-CENTURY DOCUMENTS. II

Tolsey, Bundle O

1. Various documents affecting the later history of the Charity Lands.

3 October, 1860.

Scheme of the Charity Commission on the dissolution of the Burford Corporation, vesting the Burford Charity properties in Trustees in trust for the Burford Charities. The only portions of the properties for which any particular arrangements were made were the Fifteenth Estate, the proceeds of which were ordered to be allotted to the National Schools; Wisdom's Almshouse, which was ordered to be sold and the money allotted to the Great Almshouse; and the Tradesmen's Fund, allotted to the Grammar School.

3 July, 1863.

Scheme of the Charity Commission under the Act 24 & 25 Victoria, amalgamating the funds of the Great Almshouse, the Tanfield Charity, the Widows' Fund (comprising Vesey's, Atwell's, and Willett's gifts), Meady's Charity, and certain holdings of stock into one fund for the benefit of the Great Almshouse.

5 April, 1869.

Exchange of a house forming part of the School Lands for another house near the School.

The School Lands house was on the north side of Witney Street, bounded on the north by the river Windrush, on the west by the cottage and garden of Letitia Smith, and on the east by cottages called Leather Alley. It was occupied by T. Beckley. The house for which it was exchanged belonged to J. Banbury and was in Lawrence Lane and bounded by the School playground on the south and east. Banbury received also a consideration of £20.

13 April, 1886.

Scheme by the Charity Commission consolidating the Great Almshouse, Castle's Almshouses, and Edmond Harman's Charity.

The Great Almshouse at this time possessed :

- i. The buildings on Church Green.
- ii. A rood of land at Ducklington.
- iii. About 11 acres of land at Curbridge.
- iv. The Tanfield house in Sheep Street.
- v. £3 a year from Poole's Lands.
- vi. £5 4s. a year from Church Lands.
- vii. £868 13s. 5d. Consols.
- viii. £221 15s. 1d. Consols.

Castle's Almshouses possessed :

- i. The buildings in Guildenford.
- ii. A cottage in Guildenford.
- iii. £187 9s. 1d. Consols.

Harman's Charity of £4 4s. a year proceeded out of the Port Mills, then owned by Miss Youde.

12 May, 1891.

Order by the Charity Commission, since the County Council had taken over the Bridge as a County bridge, to transfer to the Council a sum of £87 9s. 8d. in $2\frac{3}{4}$ % Consols, belonging to the Bridge Estate.

Draft of a scheme by the Charity Commission for the sale of the Fifteenth's Estate, 18 perches of land and a cottage which had become ruinous in Priory Lane. The draft authorizes the sale of the property for £120.

2. A packet of papers relating to a dispute in 1899 as to the ownership of the Tolsey.

The Parish Council wished to obtain a lease of the building with a view to its preservation. The Charity Trustees claimed to be the owners, and had received a rent of 1s. a year from the Reading Room Committee as owners.

A case was submitted to counsel in which it was stated that the building 'had formerly always been used by the Lord of the Manor and the Corporation conjointly, by the Lord for holding his annual Court there, he claiming also a right to stallage underneath the building, and by the Corporation for an armoury for the Militia. The county magistrates prior to 1840 held their justices' meetings at the Tolsey with the permission of the Corporation'.

Counsel (Mr. Corrie Grant) held that probably the claim of the Lord of the Manor was barred by Statute, he having apparently made no claim since 1863. But whether no claim had been made was doubtful. This opinion is dated 11 Oct., 1899.

Subsequently, after the publication of the volume of the Historical Manuscripts Commission containing certain Burford documents, Mr. Corrie Grant's opinion was again asked, the new fact presented to him being that on p. 42 of that volume it appears in the course of the Rules of the Fellowship of Burgesses of Burford that the Corporation charged for stallage under the Tolsey in 1605. Mr. Corrie Grant was of the opinion that this reference did not help towards a solution of the main question; to conclude from this that the Corporation were the owners of the building would be too large a deduction.

Included in this packet is a lease of the Tolsey by the Charity Trustees to the Parish Council.

FRAGMENT OF THE RECORD BOOK OF THE BURFORD BOROUGH COURT

Tolsey

Note.—The following fragment of the Record Book of the Borough Court was found by R. H. Gretton at the Tolsey in October 1915. Another fragment was found by the Rev. W. D. Macray among the Cheatile Papers, when he examined the Burford Records for the Historical MSS. Commission in 1899.

The handwriting is very crabbed. But the real difficulty in transcription has been that the clerk knew very little Latin and had clearly learned by rote certain formulas sufficient for the ordinary entries. When he has to make other kinds of entries he uses words out of these formulas without any regard for case of nouns or tense of verbs. At times he gives up altogether and inserts phrases in English. All this makes the transcription nonsense as Latin at several points. But the meaning is clear enough.

The entries of pleas of debt repeat themselves so often that the transcription has only been made in full for the first two folios. After that it has been transcribed with the original abbreviations unaltered, except where any unusual entry occurs.

The clerk's method was to enter in the left-hand margin the date at which the action was entered, writing the word 'actio' followed by the date, and to enter under this date the various dates at which the suit was heard. Most of the cases have at the head the words 'narr de rec' which I take to mean 'narratio debiti recepta'—'statement of the debt received'; but occasionally the heading is 'non narr'—which would mean that no statement had been filed. Two other entries occur, on the right-hand side of the pages—'s fe pd', which appears to mean 'secta feodi predicti'; and 'attac p psons', which seems to be the clerk's way of saying that the parties attended in person.

1. Fragment of the Book of the Borough Court, 1596-7. See transcription above.

2. A book of accounts roughly bound in vellum, containing entries for various years between 1735 and 1745. It appears from internal evidence to have belonged to Paul Silvester, who was Bailiff in 1734 and other years. The volume contains private accounts as well as some Bailiffs' Accounts. The latter show payments in connexion with the Royal Commission of 1738 to solicitors and others, receipts and payments in the Lenthall and Tanfield Charities, &c. The only entry of particular interest is as follows :

A Copyy of a Wrighting del to Jno. Lenthall Esq by the Corporation wch he was desired by them to be Read at a Vestry the 29 of May 1737: wch he did not doe / Whereas divers aspersions are Industiously Cast on the Bayliffs of the Bourough of Burford relating to their disposing of the Benefactions given to pious uses wch Representations in all Likelihood tends to create a Breach in our Neighbourhood & is Consequently destructive to the Commonwealth of the said town, Now we the Bayliffs and Burgesses of Burford aforesaid being conscious to ourselves that none of the Charitys have been by us either abused or Misemployed and being willing to prevent & set aside all faction and disturbance betwixt us & our Neighbours do hereby Consent & agree to all Such Measures as shall be properly proposed & taken and is thought most agreeable for the Ease & wellfare of the parish In order to wipe of the aforesaid aspersions and Satisfie every one Concerned, May the 29: 1737.

III. DOCUMENTS IN THE POSSESSION OF THE GOVERNORS OF BURFORD GRAMMAR SCHOOL

Burford Grammar School was founded in the year 1571. Simon Wisdom traditionally occupies the honoured position of the Founder ; but the documents which follow show that tradition in this instance requires some modification. The honour of the first movement in the founding of the school does not belong to him. His deed of gift is dated in October 1571 ; but in May of that year certain prominent Burford men had already set up an endowment for the purposes of a school.

Yet, since a school must have a Founder to revere, Simon Wisdom has no bad claim to the position, for more than one reason. Firstly, he gave to the school houses which were his private property, whereas the earlier deed is less a deed of gift, strictly speaking, than an allocation to new purposes of property long previously given to charitable uses. It is, in fact, a conveyance by certain co-feoffees of parish lands, to new feoffees, of lands and houses formerly given to the Church and the Gild. In the proceedings which followed the Edwardian Act dissolving the Gilds and Chantries much of the old charity property in Burford was confiscated. Some of it escaped for a time, only to be claimed later by the Crown. The claim failed, but the feoffees in possession of the property may well have felt that the best way to secure for the town any doubtful items was to allocate them to a new use much in favour with the Crown at that time—the provision of education for the young. That had been the more or less explicit intention of Edward VI's Commissioners in the scheduling of Gild and Chantry property, though private greed and the opportunity of profitable investment, by obtaining Crown grants of the confiscated lands, had vitiated the intention ; and the founding of schools, which had begun in his reign, had advanced rapidly under Elizabeth. It would, therefore, be very natural for these Burford feoffees to turn their minds in that direction when they felt their title to some of the charity lands to be insecure ; and in the wide and grasping interpretation then given to the term 'superstitious uses', it is obvious that property such as the Cakebred land, of which the original purpose—the endowment of an obit—was recorded in their muniments, or like 'Jesus acre', which betrayed its purpose in its name, might at any time be claimed for confiscation.

Nor is it only the different and more personal character of Simon Wisdom's gift which entitles him to rank as the Founder. Evidently the first movement had hung fire until he brought his energy to bear upon it, for although the conveyance of the charity property is dated in May 1571, the new feoffees did not actually enter into possession until February 1572. Moreover, the creation of an endowment was not the only necessity. The School could not come into existence until it had constitutions and a scheme of practical working drawn up for it ; and this Simon Wisdom did. Appended to his deed of gift are the Rules and Constitutions, written with his own hand. They are careful and thoughtfully devised, a little exacting, from the modern point of view, in the hours of teaching which they enjoin, and jejune, perhaps, in the subjects they propose for teaching. In one point they provoke a smile ; the clause concerning the daily recital of certain prayers ordains that one of these shall be the Collect beginning 'Almighty God, the fountain of all wisdom'—a singular way, to say the least, of commemorating the Founder's name.

Simon Wisdom does not in his own deed speak of himself as 'the Founder', but as 'one of the founders'. Still, it is fairly clear that his energy, and still more his love of organization and system, which is traceable, for instance, elsewhere in the form of oath which he drew up for the Steward of the Fellowship of Burgesses, were the main factors in the successful creation of the Grammar School ; and he may, therefore, be regarded as having done much more than just adding to the first endowment a sum which made the income sufficient, in the money of that time, for the engagement of a schoolmaster.

Endowment, however, was not all that had to be provided. A fund for the erection of buildings was also necessary. We gather from the constitutions that subscription was expected to provide this money; provision is made for certain privileges, in connexion with the nomination of pupils and the official visiting of the school, to be enjoyed by those who should give sums of money. But it is also to be gathered, from the earliest leases of the lands and houses conveyed in 1571, that another method of raising the building fund was to grant leases at a comparatively small rent in consideration of cash payments.

Here, again, Simon Wisdom evidently helped the project forward. Entries in the Corporation Memorandum Book of this period recording sums repaid to him on account of the School, or due to him for repayment, show that he advanced ready money for paying the builders, and had it refunded to him as money came in from the other sources which have been mentioned.

Thus arose the building at the corner of Church Lane which survives to this day, plain and simple, but, in its comparatively humble way, of some dignity. The School, as originally founded, was for the youth of the town and parish, and was therefore what we should now call a day school. The master apparently lived in a house elsewhere in the town.¹ Thus the only building required was one that would provide class-rooms for the elder boys—the Grammar Scholars—and the younger boys, or ‘petties’, as they were called, who were not beyond the stage of learning their alphabet; hence the simple character and ground plan of the old school block.

Within a very short time Burford Grammar School had produced the first of its notable alumni, Peter Heylin and Marchmont Needham, both of whom attained some notoriety, if not distinction, among the partisan writers of the Civil War period. The Heylin name appears frequently in the preceding Records, and the Needham name is also to be found.

With the exception of these pupils the School may be said to have no history for the first century and a half of its existence. Its income was increased by the raising of rents which the Royal Commission of 1628 ordered in all branches of the Burford Charities. The two school 'wardens' were regularly appointed, as the Register of Parish Officers shows; and the surviving early books of accounts are carefully kept.

Then, unfortunately, the School fell into that slough of mismanagement in which the whole of the charity administration in Burford had become involved early in the eighteenth century. The first sign of this is that soon after 1700 the school accounts, instead of containing entries of expenditure on various school purposes by the wardens, enter merely the payment of the whole proceeds of the school property to the master, Richard Griffiths. This would, of course, have been incorrect procedure, even if Griffiths had been an honest man, fit to be trusted with the entire responsibility. It becomes worse than incorrect when we find, from the proceedings of the Royal Commission of 1738, that he was idle, careless, and unfit for his post. The School was utterly neglected; no usher had been appointed for years past to attend to the younger boys, and Griffiths himself made no pretence of teaching the elder ones. He was drawing the whole of the school income, and spending it himself. By the time the Commission was appointed, he was actually of unsound mind. He evidently had stood very well with the Burgesses, and they incorporated defence of him with their own defence in the Chancery suit that was the sequel to the Commission.

The School must have taken some time to recover from such neglect. But that it did so we may gather from the fact that before this century ended two more notable men had had their early education here. They were Sir William Beechey, the Royal Academician, who was born in Burford in 1753, and Charles Jenkinson, first Earl of Liverpool and Prime Minister. The Jenkinsons were seated at Walcote, and some of them served as Trustees of the Burford Charities, which may perhaps account for Charles Jenkinson being sent here to school.

But there was no real recovery. By the beginning of the nineteenth century the School had ceased to exist. An attempt to revive it was made in 1863, a meeting of the Charity Trustees with the Assistant Charity Commissioner was held, and the School was reopened. Five years later it was again in a very bad condition, and was the subject of an inquiry which resulted in the appointment of a competent Master, and since that date, with the present Constitution, drawn up by the Charity Commissioners in 1876, it has flourished, filling a very valuable place in the life of the country-side.

Petition by John Derehurst of Hardewyk, Com. Glouc., gentleman, for a writ sub poena against William Byschopp of Burford, merchant. Setting forth that the petitioner and Byschopp were severally seised of certain lands and tenements in the town of Gloucester, to all which divers charters belonged, which charters petitioner had sealed in a box. He had 'bayled' the box to Byschopp, the latter promising to 'rebayle' the box with the charters to petitioner upon due request made. Petitioner was now unable to recover the charters, and being unable therefore to prove his title to the severalty of the lands and tenements he could not convey them, which he wished to do.

1475-80 or 1483-5. E.C.P. : Bundle 57, no. 276. (Chancellor, The Bishop of Lincoln.)

Petition by William Bisshop for a writ sub poena against Thomas

Fermor. Setting forth that one John Tanner in his life was seised of a messuage with appurtenances in Burford, 'which is a Bourough where londes and tenementes of tyme that no mynde is have and yet be dyvysible by testament'. He devised the messuage to his wife Johanna, and after her death to his son Walter and his heirs; and if Walter died without heirs, then the vicar and churchwardens of Burford were to sell the house and dispose of the proceeds at their discretion 'for the wele of his soule and the soule of his wife'. Walter died without heirs, and the vicar and churchwardens sold the house to William Bisshop. But the charters and deeds and all other evidences came into the hands of Thomas Fermor, who refused to give them up.

The reply of Thomas Fermor sets forth that the aforesaid Walter, being duly seised of the messuage with another adjoining to it in Burford, sold the two messuages to him for twenty marks, and he denied that the vicar and churchwardens had made any such sale as alleged.

The further answer of William Bishop was that his allegations were true, and that Fermor knew perfectly well of the ultimate disposition of the property by John Tanner's will.

The further reply of Thomas Fermor is that his reply is good and sufficient, and that he knew nothing of any such disposition.

1486-93. E.C.P.: Bundle 92, no. 37. (Chancellor, The Archbishop of Canterbury.)

Petition by Thomas Everard and Elizabeth his wife, Thomas Pynnock and John Alane, executors of one John Pynnok, for a writ sub poena against John Longe. Setting forth that John Pynnock with one John Longe by the assent and agreement of Thomas Say of Abyndon, Thomas Fermer and John Buttrell bargained and sold unto Ralf Astereche of London and others 'an c and iiii sakkes of Cotteswold wolle for the some of a m^lxxxiii li. ix^s. and ix^d.' Of this sum it was agreed between the parties that John Pynnock should have to his own use £92, and Pynnock, for the trust he had in John Longe caused the buyers to be bound to Longe for the payment of the sum of £92 for the only use of Pynnock, payable at certain dates. Petitioners say that John Longe had paid none of it.

The reply of John Longe sets forth that Fermor, Say, Pynnock and Boterell, being severally possessed of the wools mentioned, thomas Fermor by their consent sold it to Rauf Astryche and the others for a certain sum to be paid severally to the parties after certain days, and for the payment were bound to Fermor and Longe; that John Pynnock's share was £80, which Longe had well and truly paid to Pynnock during the latter's lifetime. Also that Longe himself never 'medelyd with the sale of the seid wollys'.

In the same Bundle, no. 40.

Petition by Everard and his wife, Thomas Pynnock and John Aleyn 'chapelyn', for a writ of Certiorari to the Sheriffs of London. Setting forth that John Long of London, 'Bruer', when witnesses in the preceding case had been examined and the matter rested upon judgement, commenced an action of debt against the petitioners for £120 before the Sheriffs of London and by force of this suit had attached three horses belonging to the petitioners. The action was feigned; and if the claim were true, it depended upon the judgement now pending. The action was vexatious, and was intended to make the petitioners drop their previous action.

1486-93 or 1504-15. E.C.P.: Bundle 128, no. 20. (Chancellor, The Archbishop of Canterbury.)

Petition by William Colton for a writ sub poena against Agnes Colton. Setting forth that petitioner had lent to Richard Colton of Burford, his brother, 40s. of ready money. Richard made Agnes his wife his executor, and since his decease petitioner had made repeated application for payment but had been unable to obtain it. He is without remedy at the Common Law 'for that an accion of dett uppon a prest or a nude contract is not mayntenable ayenst executours'.

John Moisiej died and the property descended to his son and heir, John Moisiej. John the younger died, and the property descended to Richard Moisiej, his son and heir. Richard Moisiej died without issue, and the right in the property descended to the petitioner as cousin and heir to John Moisiej the elder, being son and heir to Agnes sister and heir to the said John Moisiej. Then John Pynnoke and William (sic) Granger died, and William Pryour, outliving them, became sole seised of the property. He died, and the property descended to John Pryour, his son and heir, who entered into possession. John Pryour, though frequently requested to do so, refused to make an estate in the property to the petitioner.

Petition by Thomas Dorman of Burford, 'bocher', for a writ sub poena against Thomas Janyver of Burford. Petitioner had no remedy at Common Law, 'forasmoch as he knoweth not the nowmbre of the saide evidences charters and munyments nor wherein they be conteigned'.

1504-15. E.C.P.: Bundle 278, no. 17. (Chancellor, The Archbishop of Canterbury.)

Petition by Richard Adams of Sodbury, com. Glouc., for a writ sub poena against Richard Somerby of Tetbury and his wife. Setting forth that petitioner and one Harry Adams had bought certain wools of one Thomas Stanton of Burford for the sum of £68, for which sum they were jointly bound. The wools had been equally divided. Petitioner had paid £30 and Harry Adams became debtor for 'the resydew that is to say xxx li.' Harry Adams died, having made a will declaring himself thus indebted, and making Margery his wife his executor. She married Richard Somerby, and the two had paid £5 in part payment of the debt. Now Thomas Stanton had commenced an action of debt against Richard Adams, petitioner, for the residue of the debt, which he contended Somerby and his wife ought to pay.

Petition by William a Chambre and Margaret his wife for a writ sub poena against William Crane. Setting forth a complaint of detention of deeds concerning a half burgage in Burford.

The reply of William Crane sets forth that petitioners had no right to the premises, which were claimed by one Thomas Stodham, and he requests that Stodham may be joined in the suit.

Another document apparently sets forth Stodham's case, claiming the half burgage by inheritance from Agnes Pynnok, who had held it as heir of William Symonds.

During the first year Guison was taken and 'emprisoned', and one Edmund Bury of Hampton Poyle became owner of the premises and put one John Fisher into them. Fisher bought such corn and chattels as the petitioner had there at the time. Petitioner paid £4 for the first year's rent, 'and so departed'. Fisher had since paid the rent. (g) RECORDS OF THE AUGMENTATION OFFICE 1541. Decrees of the Court of Augmentations. Exch. K. R. Augm. Office: Misc. Bks., vol. 93.

fol. 167. Michaelmas Term, 22 October, 33 Henry VIII.

Richard Hannes produced a lease from Thomas Cade, Master of the Hospital of St. John the Evangelist at Burford, dated 22 September, 28 Henry VIII, granting him the Hospital's property at Asthall for a term of 21 years at a rental of 33s. 4d. a year. It is stipulated that the tenant is not to cut down 'oke asshe nor crabbetre but in sight of and by the assente of the said Thomas Cade clerke or his successors'.

The lease was recognized by the Court, and allocated to Richard Hannes.

fol. 168 rev. Same date.

Thomas Clarke similarly produced a lease of the manor of Fifield for a term of 41 years at a rental of £4 a year.

The preamble of the lease is as follows: 'This Indenture made the 27th daye of Marche in the eight and twentie yere of the reign of our soveraigne lord king Henry the eight betweene Master Thomas Cade master and prior of the hospytall of saynt John the Evangelist founded within the town of Burford in the countie of Oxford and Peter Annysdale Alderman and Richard Hannys steward of the Burgesses of Burford aforesaid and all other of the saide Burgesses very true and perpetuall patrons of the foresaide hospytall of the one partie And Thomas Clerke of ffyffhyde otherwise called ffyfeld in the countie foresaide yoman of the other partye wytnessyth that the foresaide Thomas Cade prior at the speciall ynstance and requeste and with the full and clere assente and consente of all the foresaide Alderman Steward and Burgesses hath demysed ' . . . etc. . . .

The sealing clause is as follows : ' The foresaide master and prior of the hospytall . . . have put the comen and auncyent seale of his said hospytall and for the full assente and clere consente of the said Alderman Steward and Burgesses very true and perpetuall patrons of the same hospytall for them and their successors they have caused the comen and auncyent seale of their ffraterniteye to the same to be sett '.

fol. 172. Same date.

John Sharpe produced a lease of three yards of arable land and two acres of meadow, dated 25 September, 30 Henry VIII, for a term of 21 years at a rental of 20s. a year.

In the lease Thomas Cade is described as ' master or keper of the hospytall ' ; and the lease is granted ' with the assente and consente of Rychard Manyngton Gentilman and Alderman of the borough town of Burford aforesaid Richard Hannys Steward and their brethren Burgesses there patrons of the said hospytall '.

Lease recognized and allocated.

Proceedings of the Court of Augmentations. Exch. K. R. Augm. Ct. Proc. : 13, 10.

Barker complained that defendants were in possession of lands of the late Hospital relying on leases from Cade which, he pleaded, were void in law, whereas he himself held a lease of the whole property of the late Hospital, including ' the mancyon howses of the said hospitall and manor '. He pleaded that Cade had no right to make leases without the consent of his brethren for a longer period than that of his own life. He admitted that a lease which he himself held from Cade of the whole property was equally void ; but he stated that he had been instrumental in persuading Cade to hand over the Hospital to the Crown, and had therefore obtained a new lease from the Crown for a term of 21 years at a rent of £11 22*d.* by indenture under the seal of the Court of Augmentations dated 23 March, 32 Henry VIII. The defendants, however, had craftily obtained an injunction against him.

An answer by John Jones and Richard Hannes sets forth that Barker had done nothing to persuade Cade to surrender the Hospital, and that their leases were good in law.

Augm. Off. Misc. Bks. : vol. 402.

A Survey of the possessions of the late Hospital of St. John the Evangelist in Burford. The details are as recorded above (Rentals and Surveys, p. 621, supra) with the following exceptions :

Against the entries of the holdings of John Sharpe, Hardgrave, Richards, Faller, Ensdale, Browne, Wynchester, Cockerell, Clarke, Cotton, Bygge, and Willeshire is marked 'vacat'.

STAR CHAMBER PROCEEDINGS, Henry VIII, vol. vii, ff. 51-71 :—

Bill of Complaint of Rychard Hannes and John Lambart, bayliffs of the Towne of Burford in the countie of Oxon :—John Jones, collector of the xths and xvths within the Hundred of Bampton, directed his precept vnto the said bayliffs for the leuying and gethering of the tax graunted by Parliament in the 32nd yere of the King's (Henry VIII) reign. Thereupon the said bayliffs caused all the Inhabytants wythin the towne of Burford to be assembled together in theyre common hall, and then and there, accordyng to theyre olde and auneynt vsage, caused a bill to be made and wryten of the names of all such persons inhabytyng within the said towne as were and shuld be contrybutory to the payment of the tax, with the somes of money that eury of them was then taxed att. In this bill Edmond Sylvester, oone of the inhabytants of the towne, was taxed and sessed at xxd., John Barker at iij s. iij d., and Thomas Barton at iij s. iij d., after the rate of oon peny of the shelyng of the rent of eury of theyre howses, like as all othyr were sessed. The bill was delivered to Symon Wynchester and Robert Alflete, constables of Burford, for the due collection of the money ; who repayred and cam vnto the seyd Edmond Sylvestre, John Barker, and Thomas Barton dyvers and sundry tymes and requyred theym to make payment of the sayd somes of money sessed and taxed vpon them according as is aforeseyd ; but they, nothyng consyderyng theyre dutyes in that behalf, nor the olde and auncyent vsage and custome vsed and accustomyd within the towne, in most obstynat peruerse maner vtterly refused and denyed to paye the sayd somes. Moreover, they confederated themselves together with diuers others of the same towne, intendyng not only to wythholde and withstande the payment, but also to sett disordre and dyuyssion amongst theyre cobrethren and the comyns of the towne, sayinge that they wolde make a comon wealth. Wherevpon certeyn of the auncyent men of the towne were sent vnto Sir John Bruggs, Knight, the King's Steward of the towne, desiring him to come vnto the towne for Reformacon and Redres of these abuses ; who coming, found the towne greatly owte of order and good Rule, and all mysordered persons suffered to go vnpunysshed. Certain of the seditious persons he therevpon comyted to warde ; notwithstanding which, there is still such great discorde and contencon stirred and moued amongst the Inhabytants, that the said Bayliffs dare not at this tyme ponysshe any offenders, or doo anythyng concernyng the good orderyng of the towne.

Defendant John Barker, in his Answer, says the complaint is made only of malice and envy. He himself is none of the inhabytants of the towne, but is taxed with them of the owtwarde, that is, as he alleges, according to his goods and not according vnto the rents of theyre howses. Further, his howse, as a spirituall howse, ought not to be taxed. For the rest, he declares that whereas the tax was sessed at the rate of one penny in the shilling, the Bailiffs have levied it at the rate of twopence. Moreover, he denies that he hath at any tyme vsid himself in the sayd towne in any soche vnlawfull maner or fasshion as by the sayd bill is supposed. On the other hand, whereas there was a boke made and streded vnto the constables of the towne for the speddy collecon on the tax, when defendants desired to see this boke the bayliffs vtterly denied theyre request, saying how that they, nother none suche as they, shuld be made privie to know what the boke wold or dyd com vnto. Wherefore diuers of the inhabytants were privately and vnlawfully (as already alleged) chargyd vnto a further some then the some which they were (taxed) att.

A commission was appointed by the King to inquire into the alleged disturbances and abuses. It was composed of Sir Walter Stoner, knt., Sir John Bridges, knt., William Fermour and Thomas Bridges (Sir John's brother), and sat at Burford on the 20th of Sept., 33 Henry VIII, when the following witnesses were examined :—

William Hodges of Burford, baker, aged 60, 'borne within the towne of Burford, and hath kept his household there continually by the space of xl yeres', who deposes that a hundred persons at least, being householders, were present in the Guild Hall when the taxation was made; that the house called Ivy House, which defendant Barker now holdeth in Burford, hath been ever contributory to the common charges of the towne, such as the watch, and hath given the holy loff; And further he sayeth that he hath seen one John Clemson, somtyme dwelling within the house of the Hospital of Saint John in Burford, and there keping household, and having the Priour boarding in his howse, chosyn owte of the same howse to be constable of the towne of Burford.

Thomas Richards of the same town, sadler, aged 66 yeres.

Robert Ennysdale of the same town, wullen draper, aged 46 yeres.

William Hewis of the same town, glover, aged 40 yeres.

William Roberts of the same town, baker, aged 40 yeres.

Who depose that the deposition of William Hodges is in everything true; that the wief of Edmond Sylvester payed her husbonds porcyn to the constable, prayenge hym that he would speake nomore to her husbond for itt; that there was nomore money gethered by the sessment than was truly accompted, but only the some of ijs. xd., which was gyven agayne to xij poor men; that a true and perfect boke was made of the same, which boke was openly brought before Sir John Bridges and Thomas Bridges, Stewards of the towne; that certain of the defendants, asserting the contrary, and resolved to have the matter newly examined and redressed, went with pen and inke and paper from howse to howse, to the number of twentie houses, requiryng eury man to take their parties, saying they wold make them as free as Bayliffs of the towne by Cristmasse Day, and that they should by and sell as freely as any Burgesse ; that after that the towne grewe into suche murmor and controuersye that there was like to ensue greate inconvenyence, insomuche that William Hiatt said vnto John Jones in the strete : Come forthe, and all thy men with thee, if they be fortie, for now wee are prouided for thee ; and the said Hiatt sayed vnto his owne wief, in the hyringe of one John Hannys of Burford, then constable : I trust ones to be Bayliff of the towne, and see some of the Burgesses hangyd, and to sitt vppon them my silf ; that Sir John Bridges and Thomas Bridges came to the towne and tooke vppon them the exaumynacon of the matter openly and thoroughly, and could fynde no falte in the officers nor Burgesses, on which occasion the said Sylvester, being askyd what was the cause of the grudge, aunsweryd that they could shewe none, forasmuche as the matter was before the Lord Chauncellor and the King's Counsaill, but said that that they did was for a comon wealthe ; and the forsaide Hiatt, then stondyng by, said Yea, and for the King's advauntage ; whervppon the said Sir John Bridges and Thomas Bridges wyllyd them to fynde suretie, which to doo they vtterly refusyd, and therevppon they were comytted to warde and letten owte agaynst the daye that they should appeare before the King's Counsaill.

The above were witnesses for the Burgesses and Bailiffs. Against the Burgesses and Bailiffs there were called the following :—

Henry Parratt of Burford, towne clerke, aged 32, who hath dwellyd within the towne but only fyve yeres.

Robert Alflet, smith, aged 40.

John Hayter, yeoman, aged 57, who sayth that he was in the Guild Hall in the mornyng, the daye of the assessment, when there weare no mo in the Hall but only the Bayliffs and oon John Jones, and ij mo with hym.

John Smythyer, husbondman, aged 50.

Thomas Ockford, wever, aged 26.

John Colyns, showmaker, aged 60, and Nicholas Stanes, laborer, aged 50, who sayeth that he was nother at the begynnynge nor at the end, and therefore what was doone for the taxacon he knoweth not.

Other witnesses, called on behalf of Edmond Sylvester, John Barker, and other defendants, were :—

John Barker of Burford, gent (one of the defendants).

Edmund Silvester, mercer.

William Hiatt, baker.

Thomas Barton, innkeeper.

Robert Wigpit, fletcher.

John Sands, servant to Thomas Abridges, Esq. and constable of Burford, who deposes that he had William Hiatt, and fyve others, to warde in the stokhowse for their misdemeanors.

The result of the inquiry is not disclosed by the documents.

B.M. Stowe MSS. 752.

Letters from William Borlase to Lyttelton, Dean of Exeter.

1753. Fol. 155.

From Cirencester we came along the Foss, which, tho' call'd thus, is a Ridgeway and Roman, to Burford.

The Church at Burford has been built at several times : The Tower on which the Spire is erected, is near the middle of the building, and is of y^e Saxon style : the Arches on which it stands are semicircular, low, and solid, and have a very ill effect on the inside of the Ch: being design'd doubtless for a much smaller building, than the Ch: is at present.—On the Outside of this Tower which is much more antient than the rest, there are three pannells or sham-windows, on the south side with a window of a very singular structure between them, and a window of a semicircular arch below them, all in y^e Saxon style, which I therefore send you. All above this in the tower is more modern, but of no despicable gothick taste—On the outside coving of one of the windows in Saxon letters is this Inscr^a ORASE (for Orate) pro animabus Patris et Matris Iohannis Leggare per quem ista Finestra decoratur—This Ch: is not at all uniform, and divided into several Chancels and Isles—

The Priory, now the house of Mr. Lenthall, seems to be a mighty good old house, in perfect repair—the Chapel adjoining has much Gothick ornament and some rich carvings over the Door. The whole would make a good Print, if Justice be done to it—but tis so neat than I can hardly think it prior to y^e Reformation ; and the Plantations round it are too close and crowded for such a low situation.

[A little sketch follows of the Roundheaded windows on the south side of the Church tower, described 'Saxon Remains in the Tower of the Church at Burford June 30, 1753'.]

E. BURFORD AND UPTON ENCLOSURE AWARDS

The Enclosure Awards for Burford (1795) and Upton (1773) are preserved at the Office of the Clerk of the Peace at Oxford. The following transcripts have been made from the original documents, and are in full, with a few obvious abbreviations of detail. The Award maps, which should be preserved with the Awards, are in both cases missing. But when the exchanges of enclosures provided for in the Burford Award took place a small map was prepared for the purpose, which must have been copied from the Award Map. This small map exists, and is preserved at the Tolsey, having been presented by the late Mr. Jonathan Banbury. It is dated 1823.
